TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 2,217)

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symp... Signs Petrillo U...on Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)— James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

...chestra

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Circ. (D 31,370) (S 30,181)

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
... 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC - 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston" Symphony Signs
Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Driver Piles Up in Chase

The stately calm with which the city's traffic has crept up hill and down dale since gasoline rationing began, was shattered last night as one Ellis E. Schanck, eighteen, of 406 20th Ave., "exceeded the speed and publish it without requiring they are going to get some news can't get together and decide

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symp Signs Petrillo U on Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Joins Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 3 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

wanted couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2426
One Minute's Walk from Bus

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

the
ZP

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Bos. Symphony Orchestra, the last re maining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

[23]

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

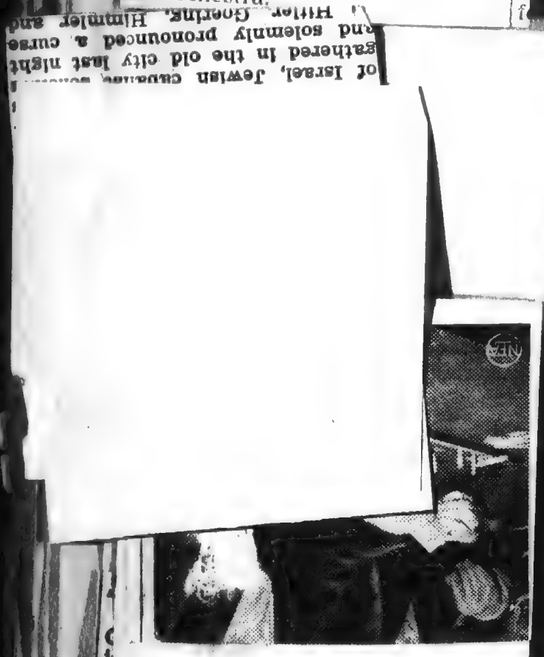
This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.



three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel 2458
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionize

New York (UP) — The Bost Symphony Orchestra, the last re maining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

[23]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC - 194

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

W YORK, Dec. 3.—(AP)—James Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

THE ORIGINAL HENRY ROMEIKE NEW YO PRESS CLIPPING

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From

By LEO H. PETERSEN

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (U.P.)—The United Press today presents its 1942 all-America football team, chosen by sports writers from coast

NEW YORK — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

DEC - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1942

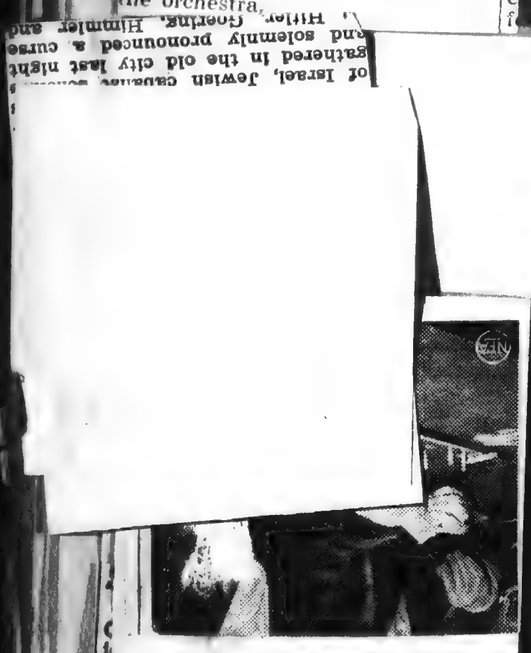
This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.



three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2484
One Minute's Walk from Bus

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

th

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

[23]

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST

4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 194

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3--(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE THE ORIGINAL NEW YORK PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

New York, Dec. 4 (A)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, anounced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
- 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2426
One Minute's Walk from Bus

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

[23]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC - 4

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

Three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY
FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2484
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

[23]

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

DEC - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 1 - 1942

Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST

4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES

1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES ITS PEACE WITH MUSICIANS' UNION

New York, Dec. 4 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC - 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2486
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

[23]

HENRY ROMEIKE INC. NEW YORK
THE ORIGINAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
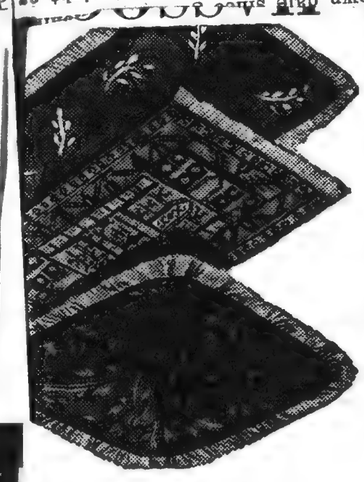
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942



This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
- 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Is Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 4 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2490
Cars Midgets Walk From Here

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

[23]

HENRY ROMEIKE INC. THE ORIGINAL NEWS PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
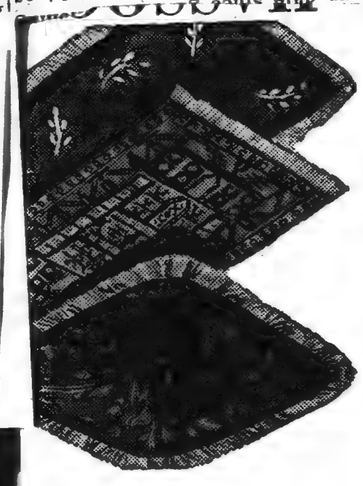
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942



This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST

James C, Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

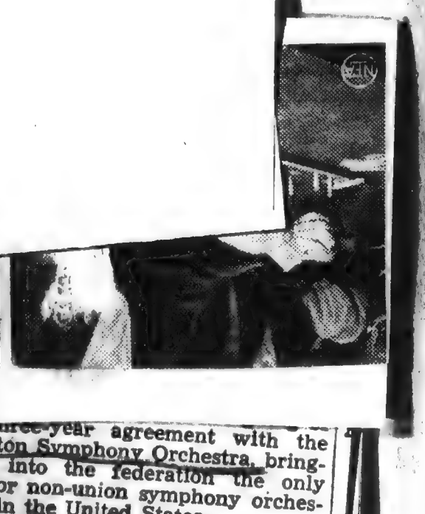
THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC [illegible]

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3 -(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

[illegible] Hitler, Goering, Himmler and [illegible] solemnly pronounced a curse [illegible] gathered in the old city last night [illegible] of Israel, Jewish [illegible]



[illegible] three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

[illegible] couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2496
Cne Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

THE ORIGINAL HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
[illegible] - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 2,214)

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo Signs Symphony

New York, December 3. — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

[illegible] New Orl[illegible] from Tem[illegible]

[illegible] IN BRIEF

[illegible] Schmalz, 127; Thom, [illegible] Schubring, 110

[illegible] evening, 15-10 and 14-1[illegible] Standings follow:

consideration. Other senators also got rebellious.

So the bill was stalled, the committee called Governor Gruening for a hearing, and the fate of the censorship between the U. S. and its territories is now in the hands of the judiciary committee.

Harold Ickes' Enemies.

President Roosevelt gave his own very frank opinion of the nation's attitude toward labor when C. I. O.'s Phil Murray and A. F. L.'s Bill Green called to ask that a labor leader be made manpower chief.

They proposed the name of Dan Tobin, A. F. L. teamsters' boss, as secretary of labor and head of manpower. The President, however, countered with the name of Secretary Ickes.

[23]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

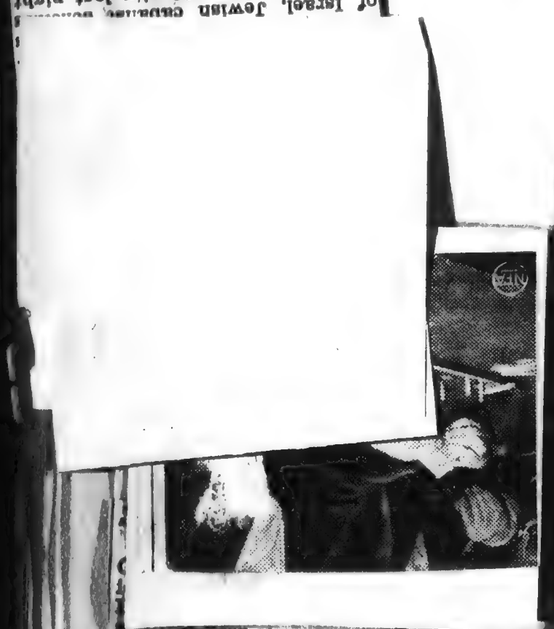
DEC 3 - 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

wanted employment ... couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.



HENRY ROMEIKE INC. THE ORIGINAL NEW YORK PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2626
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Petrillo Union Pact

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

SYMPHONY UNIONIZED

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(INS) The Boston Symphony orchestra, only major non-union symphony orchestra in the nation, became unionized today after its 105 players and leader Dr. Serge Koussevitsky joined the American Federation of Musicians, headed by James C. Petrillo. The agreement is for three years. The action lifted Boston Symphony off the union blacklist imposed upon it by Petrillo, and ended its long isolation outside of union circles.

consideration. Other senators also got rebellious.

So the bill was stalled, the committee called Governor Gruening for a hearing, and the fate of the censorship between the U. S. and its territories is now in the hands of the judiciary committee.

Harold Ickes' Enemies.

President Roosevelt gave his own very frank opinion of the nation's attitude toward labor when C. I. O.'s Phil Murray and A. F. L.'s Bill Green called to ask that a labor leader be made manpower chief.

They proposed the name of Dan Tobin, A. F. L. teamsters' boss, as secretary of labor and head of manpower. The President, however, countered with the name of Secretary Ickes.

[23]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 194

...ived.

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE THE ORIGINAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
...- 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 2,217)

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symp... Signs Petrillo U...on Pact ...chestra

NEW YORK, Dec. 3. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

...ree-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

...couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel 2498
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

consideration. Other senators also got rebellious.

So the bill was stalled, the committee called Governor Gruening for a hearing, and the fate of the censorship between the U. S. and its territories is now in the hands of the judiciary committee.

Harold Ickes' Enemies.

President Roosevelt gave his own very frank opinion of the nation's attitude toward labor when C. I. O.'s Phil Murray and A. F. L.'s Bill Green called to ask that a labor leader be made manpower chief.

They proposed the name of Dan Tobin, A. F. L. teamsters' boss, as secretary of labor and head of manpower. The President, however, countered with the name of Secre-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 194

...ived.

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON
W YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James
Petrillo, president of the Amercan federation of musicians, AFL, oday announced the signing of a hree-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL

DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS

DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

...chestra
...on Pact

...trillo said the agreement,
...ring 105 members of the or-
...tra, represented a concession
...he part of the federation, in
... the union amended its by-
...s to permit symphony musi-
...ns to move from one symphojurisdiction to another within United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

DEC 4 - 1942

...three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.
...wanted ... couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

Signed by AFM

New York — AP — James C. Petrillo, president of the AFL-American Federation of Musicians, Thursday announced signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

consideration. Other senators also got rebellious.

So the bill was stalled, the committee called Governor Gruening for a hearing, and the fate of the censorship between the U. S. and its territories is now in the hands of the judiciary committee.

Harold Ickes' Enemies.

President Roosevelt gave his own very frank opinion of the nation's attitude toward labor when C. I. O.'s Phil Murray and A. F. L.'s Bill Green called to ask that a labor leader be made manpower chief. They proposed the name of Dan Tobin, A. F. L. teamsters' boss, as secretary of labor and head of manpower. The President, however, countered with the name of Secre-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC [illegible] 4

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON
NEW YORK, Dec. 3.--(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston" Symphony Signs
Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
[illegible] - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 2,214)

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

[illegible] F. [illegible]
Boston [illegible] ony

NEW YORK, Dec. 4—(UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, last remaining non-union organization of its kind, has signed an agreement with the American Federation of Musicians. The agreement came after six months of negotiations. Union Chief James C. Petrillo says his organization has amended its laws as an inflexible [illegible] the Boston Sym[illegible] the union [illegible]

[illegible]chestra
[illegible]on Pact

[illegible]trillo said the agreement [illegible]ng 105 members of the or[illegible] represented a concession [illegible]t of the federation, in [illegible]ion amended its by[illegible] it symphony musi[illegible] from one sympho[illegible] another within [illegible]nd Canada.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

[illegible]-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

[illegible] wanted [illegible] couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
FLIN[illegible]
JOU[illegible]
DEC 4 - 19[illegible]

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4-1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo Signs Symphony

New York, December 3. — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2496
One Minute's Walk From Bus

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

GRE[illegible]
DEC 4 - [illegible]

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - [illegible]

oston Symp[illegible]ony
Is Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

[illegible] Standings [illegible] 12-10 [illegible] evening and [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

HENRY ROMEIKE INC. THE ORIGINAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

"Boston" Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942
Circ. (D 29,517) (S 29,654)

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT
DEC 4 - 1942

Signed by Petrillo

New York-(AP)-James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, has announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Hippodrome Bowling Alleys
J. Leduc 97 107 91 295; R. Lavigne 97 71 77 82 230; P. [illegible] 85 276; B. La[illegible]

...chestra ...n Pact

...trillo said the agreement ...ng 105 members of the or... represented a concession ...t of the federation, in ...ion amended its by... ...it symphony musi... ...from one sympho... ...another within ...and Canada.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

...three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo Signs Symphony

New York, December 3. — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2496
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Is Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 194[illegible]

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL
DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

sufficiently broad to cover the problem and that state and local police officials need only to enforce them strictly to give the public maximum protection. They forbid use of inflammable decoration.

However, Thomas said, a new bulletin is being sent to licensees, as a result of the Boston fire, instructing them to hold even fireproofed decorations to a minimum and then to use them only where the public will not come [illegible] General contact with [illegible]

chestra
on Pact

trillo said the agreement
ng 105 members of the or represented a concession t of the federation, in ion amended its by-it symphony musi
from one sympho another within and Canada.

Hippodrome Bowling Alleys
B7
1. Ledue 71 77 82 230; P.
Dupree 97 107 91 295; R. La-
[illegible] 85 276; B. [illegible]

DEC 4

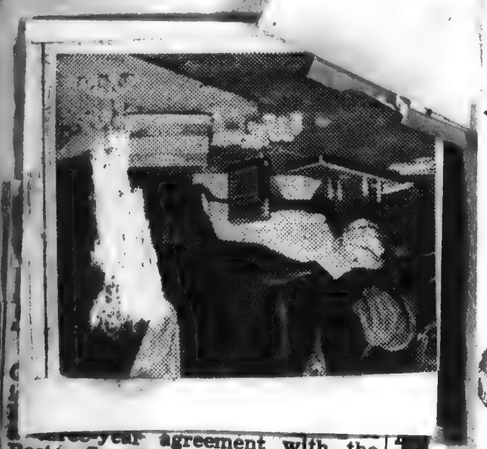
This Clipping
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo Signs Symphony

New York, December 3. — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.



Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

Boston Symphony Is Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union. Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A.F.OF L. WKLY
NEWS SERVICE
WASHINGTON, D.C.
12/1/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS TRADE UNION AGREEMEN

Boston, Mass. — The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLISTON, N. D.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1942

PETRILLO GETS BOSTON

W YORK, Dec. 3—(AP)—James Petrillo, president of the American federation of musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States. The agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra.

HENRY ROMEIKE INC. THE ORIGINAL NEW YORK PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CLEVELAND CITIZEN
CLEVELAND, OHIO
12/4/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL COURIER

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PIERRE, S. D.
CAPITAL JOURNAL

DEC 4-1942

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS

DEC 4-1942

SYMPHONY SIGNS PACT IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

TOCK

cows, 11.00-12.00; canner to common kind largely 7.50-10.50; few shells around 7.00, occasional good sausage bulls 12.75-13.00 but strictly toppy kind absent.

Vealers and calves: Salable 275; total 875; market slow. Weighty calves mostly 25 to 50 cents lower. Vealers scarce, steady. Choice vealers quotable to 18.00; good and choice weighty calves 13.00a14.00; cull and common lots 9.25a10.50.

Two years ago, 1941.Dec.4:—

can Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

couldn't go there unless he had the OK of that local board.

MURPHY FUNERAL HOME
20 Annandale Road Tel. 2426
One Minute's Walk from Bus

DEC 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

New York (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, signed an agreement today with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

DEC 4 - 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, IND.
ITEM

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1942

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HANNIBAL, MO.
LABOR PRESS
12/4/42

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS
TRADE UNION AGREEMENT

Boston, Mass. — Ahe Boston Symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

Hippodrome Bowling Alleys
H7
J. Leduc 71 77 82 230; P.
Champagne 97 107 91 295; R. Laon 85 276; B.

...chestra
...n Pact

...rillo said the agreement
...ng 105 members of the or
...represented a concession
...t of the federation, in
...ion amended its by-
...it symphony musi
...from one sympho
... another within
...and Canada.

This Clipping
FORT WAYNE
NEWS-SENTI

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
POST

DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo Signs Symphony

New York, December 3. — (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

DEC 4 -

This Clipping
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

DEC 4 - 1942

oston Symp...
Is Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 4. (INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union. Although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

Standings ... evening ... 15-10 ...

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From READING, PA.
TIMES
4 - 1942

New York, Dec. 3 (U.P.)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by P illo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
TRIBUNE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
DEC 4 - 19

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SANTA ANA, CALIF.
REGISTER
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo, Boston Orchestra Sign 3-Year Agreement

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our Federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francisco cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3 — (AP) — Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

Hub Symphony Group Joins Music Union

Concessions Granted To Major Orchestra, Petrillo Announces

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the A.F.L. American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another, within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

Conductor In Union

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said the agreement between the Boston symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the o. k. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the union for the last two years because of the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

[24]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From READING, PA.
TIMES
4 - 1942

New York, Dec. 3 (U.P.)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

[illegible] signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six mo[illegible]ths and were conducted by P[illegible]illo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
DEC [illegible]

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
TRIBUNE
DEC 4 - 194[illegible]

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
DEC 4 - 19[illegible]

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.

[illegible] Orchestra—[illegible] was signed up with the America[illegible] eration of Musicians.

Announcement of the agre[illegible] which affects 105 members of [illegible]s by-chestra, was made by James [illegible]y mus[illegible] trillo, president of the union[illegible]e syr[illegible]

Also covered by the cor[illegible] anothe[illegible] though he did not enter int[illegible]es and tions, was Dr. Serge Koussevi[illegible] ductor of the well-known [illegible]

NEW YORK, Dec[illegible] James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the o. k. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the union for the last two years because the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francised cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man-Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3—(AP)—Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

[illegible] Symphony [illegible]up Joins [illegible]sic Union

[illegible]essions Granted Major Orchestra, [illegible]illo Announces

[illegible] YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James [illegible]lo, president of the A.F.L. [illegible]n Federation of Musicians, [illegible]nounced the signing of a [illegible]ar agreement with the Bos[illegible]erat[illegible]phony orchestra, bringing [illegible]fire federation the only major [illegible]t at[illegible]n symphony orchestra in [illegible]outh[illegible]ed States.

[illegible]ting[illegible]o said the agreement, cov[illegible]. 14, [illegible]05 members of the orches[illegible]udi[illegible]resented a concession on the Dec. [illegible] the federation, in that the [illegible]urer [illegible]mended its bylaws to per[illegible]year [illegible]nphony musicians to move [illegible]hree [illegible]e symphony jurisdiction to [illegible]per[illegible], within the United States [illegible]nada.

[illegible]tiations lasted six months [illegible]rms [illegible]re conducted by Petrillo for [illegible]oby, [illegible]ion, Henry Cabot, trustee [illegible]rie, Boston organization, and a and [illegible]ttee of five men from the De[illegible]ra.

Vil[illegible]ctor In Union

op[illegible] are very happy to have the [illegible] symphony in our federa[illegible] also Petrillo said. "On both sides [illegible] of was nothing but fairness and [illegible]for[illegible]ty, whatever we agree to we [illegible]the[illegible]p to."

[illegible]ax[illegible]rillo said that Dr. Serge Kous[illegible]nd [illegible]ky, conductor of the sym[illegible]y, did not enter personally in[illegible]e negotiations, but that under [illegible]erms of the agreement he be[illegible] a member of the union im[illegible]ately. He said the agreement [illegible]een the Boston symphony and [illegible]l 90, A. F. of M., was signed [illegible]y in Boston.

[illegible]he decision to amend the by[illegible]s, Petrillo said, was reached [illegible]pt. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's [illegible]w York office of 18 locals [illegible]oughout the country where sym[illegible]s [illegible]ony orchestras operate.

[24]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From READING, PA.
TIMES
4 - 1942

New York, Dec. 3 (U.P.)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
DEC - 1942

Robert Kane, young acting director of athletics at Cornell, for example, comments on the "bucolic atmosphere at Ithaca."
...mall towns?

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 (AP) — James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicag couldn't go there unless he ha the o. k. of that local board.

"'The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radi It had been banned by the uni for the last two years because the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francisco cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man-Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3 — (AP) — Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

Symphony ...up Joins ...sic Union

...essions Granted Major Orchestra, ...illo Announces

...YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James ...lo, president of the A.F.L. ...n Federation of Musicians, ...nounced the signing of a ...ar agreement with the Bos... ...phony orchestra, bringing ...federation the only major ...n symphony orchestra in ...ed States.

...lo said the agreement, cov... ...05 members of the orches... ...resented a concession on the ... the federation, in that the ...mended its bylaws to per... ...nphony musicians to move ...e symphony jurisdiction to ..., within the United States ...nada.

...tiations lasted six months ...re conducted by Petrillo for ...nion, Henry Cabot, trustee ..., Boston organization, and a ...ttee of five men from the ...ra.

...ctor In Union

...are very happy to have the ... symphony in our federa... Petrillo said. "On both sides, ... was nothing but fairness and ...ty, whatever we agree to we ...p to."

...rillo said that Dr. Serge Kous... ...ky, conductor of the sym... ...y, did not enter personally in... ...e negotiations, but that under ...erms of the agreement he be... ... a member of the union im... ...ately. He said the agreement ...een the Boston symphony and ... 90, A. F. of M., was signed ...y in Boston.

...he decision to amend the by... ...s, Petrillo said, was reached ...t. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's ...w York office of 18 locals ...oughout the country where sym... ...ony orchestras operate.

[24]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From READING, PA.
TIMES
4 - 1942

New York, Dec. 3 (U.P.)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession [illegible] of the federation, in [redacted]

Into Petrillo's Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—to become unionized, Friday was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

3-Year [illegible]

NEW YORK, Dec. [illegible] James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francisco cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man-Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3—(AP)—Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

[illegible] Symphony [illegible]up Joins [illegible]sic Union

[illegible]essions Granted Major Orchestra, [illegible]illo Announces

[illegible] YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James [illegible]lo, president of the A.F.L. [illegible]n Federation of Musicians, [illegible]nounced the signing of a [illegible]ar agreement with the Bos[illegible]phony orchestra, bringing [illegible]erat- fire federation the only major [illegible]t at [illegible]n symphony orchestra in [illegible]outh [illegible]ed States.

[illegible]ting [illegible]o said the agreement, cov[illegible]. 14, [illegible]05 members of the orches[illegible]udi- [illegible]resented a concession on the [illegible] the federation, in that the [illegible]Dec. [illegible]mended its bylaws to per[illegible]urer [illegible]nphony musicians to move [illegible]year [illegible]he symphony jurisdiction to [illegible]hree [illegible], within the United States [illegible]per- [illegible]nada.

[illegible]tiations lasted six months [illegible]rms [illegible]re conducted by Petrillo for [illegible]bby, [illegible]ion, Henry Cabot, trustee [illegible]rie, Boston organization, and a [illegible]and [illegible]ttee of five men from the [illegible]De- [illegible]ra.

[illegible]Vil- [illegible]ctor In Union

[illegible]op- [illegible]are very happy to have the [illegible] symphony in our federa[illegible] Petrillo said. "On both sides [illegible]also [illegible] of [illegible] was nothing but fairness and [illegible]for [illegible]ty, whatever we agree to we [illegible]the [illegible]p to."

[illegible]ax [illegible]rillo said that Dr. Serge Kous[illegible]nd [illegible]ky, conductor of the sym[illegible]y, did not enter personally in[illegible]e negotiations, but that under [illegible]erms of the agreement he be[illegible] a member of the union im[illegible]iately. He said the agreement [illegible]een the Boston symphony and [illegible]l 90, A. F. of M., was signed [illegible]y in Boston.

[illegible]he decision to amend the by[illegible]s, Petrillo said, was reached [illegible]t. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's [illegible]w York office of 18 locals [illegible]oughout the country where sym[illegible]s [illegible]ony orchestras operate.

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the o. k. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the union for the last two years because the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

[24]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From READING, PA.
TIMES
4 - 1942

New York, Dec. 3 (U.P.)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maes- [illegible] members of the [illegible]

[illegible] its own an[illegible]

TOWER

New York, Dec. [illegible] last of the principal musical organizations in the country — the Boston Symphony Orchestra — to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

3-Year [illegible]

NEW YORK, Dec[illegible] James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francisco cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man-Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3 — (AP) — Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

[illegible] Symphony [illegible]up Joins [illegible]sic Union

[illegible]essions Granted Major Orchestra, [illegible]illo Announces

[illegible] YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James [illegible]lo, president of the A.F.L. [illegible]n Federation of Musicians, [illegible]nounced the signing of a [illegible]ar agreement with the Bos[illegible]phony orchestra, bringing [illegible]fire federation the only major [illegible]t at[illegible]n symphony orchestra in [illegible]outh[illegible]ed States.

[illegible]ting[illegible]o said the agreement, cov[illegible]. 14, [illegible]5 members of the orches[illegible]udi[illegible]resented a concession on the Dec. the federation, in that the [illegible]urer [illegible]mended its bylaws to per[illegible]year [illegible]nphony musicians to move [illegible]hree [illegible]e symphony jurisdiction to [illegible]per[illegible], within the United States [illegible]nada.

[illegible]tiations lasted six months [illegible]rms [illegible]re conducted by Petrillo for [illegible]bby, [illegible]ion, Henry Cabot, trustee [illegible]rie, Boston organization, and a [illegible]and [illegible]ttee of five men from the De[illegible]ra.

Vil[illegible]ctor In Union

op[illegible] are very happy to have the [illegible] symphony in our federa[illegible] also Petrillo said. "On both sides [illegible] of was nothing but fairness and [illegible] for [illegible]ty, whatever we agree to we [illegible] the [illegible]p to."

[illegible]ax [illegible]rillo said that Dr. Serge Kouss[illegible]nd [illegible]ky, conductor of the sym[illegible]y, did not enter personally in[illegible]e negotiations, but that under [illegible]erms of the agreement he be[illegible] a member of the union im[illegible]ately. He said the agreement [illegible]een the Boston symphony and [illegible] 90, A. F. of M., was signed [illegible]y in Boston.

[illegible]he decision to amend the by[illegible]s, Petrillo said, was reached [illegible]t. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's [illegible]w York office of 18 locals [illegible]oughout the country where sym[illegible]s [illegible]ony orchestras operate.

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the o. k. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the union for the last two years because of the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

[24]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From

At Boston

Brings Last One In Nation Into Fold

New York, Dec. 2 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A.F.L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
TRIBUNE
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
DEC 4 - 19
Circ. (D 31,077)

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
SANTA ANA, CALIF.
REGISTER
DEC 4 - 1942

Petrillo, Boston Orchestra Sign Agreement

4.—(AP)—

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by ePtrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Unionized

Petrillo of Musicians' Union Announces Three-Year Agreement; Koussevitsky, Conductor, Is Member

New York, Dec. 4 (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the Federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the Federation, in what the union amended its by-laws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honester. Whatever we agree to we live up to."

Koussevitsky Union Member

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and Local 90, A. F. of M., was signed yesterday in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit Symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

Petrillo said that the trustees of the Boston Symphony had informed him at the outset that they would sooner break up the orchestra

Than To Lower Its Standards

by submitting to a requirement which forced them to obtain permission from the union's local before a musician or conductor could be imported to Boston from other places.

'When I assured the management that I would change that law," Petrillo said, "they began to talk business."

The AFM president said the agreement would permit the Boston Symphony to make recordings and perform on the radio "after the dispute over recordings is ended." (He referred to the current ban on recording which the AFM ordered Aug. 1 as a means of providing employment for more musicians.)

Petrillo said there were 60 Symphony orchestras, of various grades, in the United States and Canada, and that all now were in the federation.

Circ. (D 20,819)

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With A. F. Of L.

New York, Dec. 4—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, yesterday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federaion the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabot, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

"We are very happy to have the Boston Symphony in our federation," Petrillo said. "On both sides there was nothing but fairness and honesty, whatever we agree to we live up to."

Petrillo said that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the symphony, did not enter personally into the negotiations, but that under the terms of the agreement he became a member of the union immediately. He said that the agreement between the Boston Symphony and local 90, A. F. of M., was signed today in Boston.

The decision to amend the by-laws, Petrillo said, was reached Sept. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's New York office of 18 locals throughout the country where symphony orchestras operate.

"I gave my story to them," Petrillo said, "and they voted unanimously that the president (Petrillo) use his emergency powers to amend the laws to permit symphony musicians to obtain employment in various jurisdictions, provided they are members of the A. F. M."

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE
DEC 5 - 1942

Last Holdout Symphony Joins Petrillo Union

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—(AP)—James C. Perillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, today announced the signing of a three year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 4 - 1942

LABOR BOARD

Bars Living Cost

As Basis For Wages In Case Of Hotels.

Stabilization Of Jobs Set For Maritime Industry, Is Report To House.

Washington, December 3—(AP)—The War Labor Board sidestepped today a ruling on the question of what constitutes "substandard" wages and refused to recognize localized living cost figures as a basis for apply the "Little Steel" formula.

The board took its stand in a case involving the Hotel Employers' Association of San Francisco and their employees. The decision approved substantially the wage increases awarded by an arbitrator, but substituted different reasoning.

The award of a 15 per cent increase over January, 1941, levels was approved without question, but raises allowed by the arbitrator because of substandard wages were approved by the board only to eliminate inequalities. Minor increases allowed by the arbitrator on grounds that the San Francisco cost of living was slightly higher than the national average were allowed only on grounds that they would simplify bookkeeping.

Stabilization of employment within the maritime industry will soon be ordered by the War Man-Power Commission, the House Merchant Marine Committee was told today.

SAYS ALL AGREE.

Hot S. Haddock, legislative representative of the Congress of Industrial Organizations Maritime Committee, told the committee that all maritime unions and the War Shipping Administration had agreed to a stabilization program for all men employed on ships, on lists seeking employment, or in training for employment.

Such an order is now being drafted, he said, and will be submitted tomorrow to the War Man-Power Commission, where early adoption is expected.

Haddock stressed that the proposed order would not "freeze" men in their present jobs, but would simply stabilize employment within the industry. Shifts between jobs and ships would continue freely.

New York, December 3—(AP)—James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Labor American Federation of Musicians, today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major nonunion symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

LASTS SIX MONTHS.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, Trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

South Portland, Maine, December 3 — (AP) — Production at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation yard remained virtually at a standstill today as management and union representatives continued discussions of wage classifications and the latter endeavored to persuade employees who walked out earlier in the week to return to their jobs.

The yard is engaged in building Liberty ships for the United States Maritime Commission.

Union leaders indicated they were trying to get the workers back in force for the day shift tomorrow. The walkout was without union sanction.

Chicago, December 3—(AP)—Ten men from the Chicago C. I. O. Council made an unsuccessful attempt today to appear before a joint conference of the major leagues with a request that baseball clubs hire Negro players.

The group, one of them a Negro, then told reporters they would campaign to "end Jim Crowism in baseball."

Major league clubs may hire Negro players if they choose to do so.

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER
DEC 4 - 1942

Symphony ...up Joins ...sic Union

...essions Granted Major Orchestra, ...illo Announces

YORK, Dec. 4 (AP)—James ...lo, president of the A.F.L. ...n Federation of Musicians, ...nounced the signing of a ...ar agreement with the Bos- ...phony orchestra, bringing ...federation the only major ...n symphony orchestra in ...ed States.

...lo said the agreement, cov- ...5 members of the orches- ...resented a concession on the ... the federation, in that the ...mended its bylaws to per- ...nphony musicians to move ...ne symphony jurisdiction to ..., within the United States ...nada.

...tiations lasted six months ...re conducted by Petrillo for ...ion, Henry Cabot, trustee ..., Boston organization, and a ...ttee of five men from the ...ra.

...ctor In Union

...are very happy to have the ... symphony in our federa- ... Petrillo said. "On both sides ... was nothing but fairness and ...ty, whatever we agree to we ...p to."

...rillo said that Dr. Serge Kous- ...ky, conductor of the sym- ..., did not enter personally in- ...e negotiations, but that under ...erms of the agreement he be- ... a member of the union im- ...ately. He said the agreement ...een the Boston symphony and ... 90, A. F. of M., was signed ...y in Boston.

...he decision to amend the by- ...s, Petrillo said, was reached ...t. 29 at a meeting in Petrillo's ...w York office of 18 locals ...oughout the country where sym- ...ony orchestras operate.

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Petrillo Sign Contract

NEW YORK, Dec. 3—(UP)—The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the A. F. M.

James C. Petrillo, president of A. F. M., announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of A. F. M.

"The big item that the A. F. M. had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the o. k. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'we engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well.'"

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the union for the last two years because the orchestra's non-union status. Recording privileges, however, must be held up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its strike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

[24]

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Up With AFM

Six Months of Negotiating End Amicably; A. F. M. By-Laws to Be Changed

New Rork, Dec. 4.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, has signed an agreement with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

The agreement was announced by James C. Petrillo, president of the AFM, who said his organization had amended its by-lays as an inflexible condition by the Boston Symphony for joining the union. All of the 105 members of the Symphony, including Dr. Serge Koussevitszky, its world-famous conductor, become members of the union through the agreement.

Pointing out that all of the 60 symphonies of the United States and Canada were now members of the AFM, Petrillo said he had received authority at an emergency meeting of 18 locals to amend the union by-laws in conformity with the desires of the Boston Symphony.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing Symphony players. For instance a man playing in New Fork who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O. K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engage a conductor and pay him well—in this instance Dr. Koussevitzky. When he says to us as trustees that there there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well'."

Petrillo said the trustees had informed him that unless they were able, by selecting the best musicians regardless of location, to keep up the "high standard" of the orchestra they would rather disband the organization than degrade that standard.

Petrillo said that until he had assured the Boston management that the by-law might be changed the negotiations had been deadlocked but thereafter they proceeded smoothly. He praised the "spirit of fairness" exhibited by Henry Cabot, a trustee. Also participating in the negotiations, he said, were five of the Symphony's musicians elected by the other members.

Other minor changes also were demanded by the Symphony and granted, Petrillo said, but the major result was that all symphonic players now could work in any part of the country where their services might be desired.

Petrillo pointed out that one of the benefits to the Symphony would be its return to the radio and recording studios from which it was barred by the union more than two years ago. Broadcasting and recording contracts would help the Symphony meet its deficit of $180,000 for the past two years. The Symphony also will be able to obtain world famous guest musicians whose services had been denied because of the non-union status.

Petrillo said that the recording privileges, however, could not be exercised until the AFM settled its current strike against radio and recording companies.

There had been no overtures from the radio chains, recording companies or juke box people, he said. Regarding a forthcoming Senate investigation of the union Petrillo said the AFM affairs were "an open book" that it would be "only fair that the industrty (radio) we're dealing with be investigated, but I don't think they want to be."

This Clipping From NILES, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Signs Contract with AFM

NEW YORK —(U.P.)— The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

James C. Petrillo, president of AFM, announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of AFM.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O.K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well."

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the Union for the last two years because of the orchestr's non-union status. recording privilges, however, must be help up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its trike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
DEC 5 - 1942

This Clipping From
KENTON, OHIO
NEWS-REPUBLICAN

...t the desires of a majority of ... members of the orchestra shall ...termine any demand on the part ... the union respecting their work- ... conditions."

This Clipping From
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS FREE PRESS

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 5 - 1942

Unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra Honors Toulon Dead

Boston (AP) — Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert since becoming unionized paid tribute to Frenchmen who died for the honor of their country.

Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, prefaced yesterday's concert by announcing:

"We shall begin with 'La Marseillaise' in memory of the brave French sailors who died heroically aboard their ships for the peace of the world and the honor of France."

The audience applauded the announcement, which was taken to refer to the scuttling of the French fleet at Toulon to prevent its being seized by Germans.

Much of the remainder of the program consisted of works by French composers.

Trustees of the orchestra last night confirmed the announcement of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

This Clipping From BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
DEC 5 1942

Unionized Symphony In First Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert since becoming unionized paid tribute to Frenchmen who died for the honor of their country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, prefaced Friday's concert by announcing:

"We shall begin with 'La Marseillaise' in memory of the brave French sailors who died heroically aboard their ships for the peace of the world and the honor of France."

The audience applauded the announcement, which was taken to refer to the scuttling of the French fleet at Toulon to prevent its being seized by Germans.

Trustees of the orchestra last night confirmed the announcement of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo had announced that the orchestra, hitherto the only non-union major symphony in the nation, has signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

Commenting on this phase, the trustees said in a statement:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in according them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

This Clipping From
WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
DEC 7 - 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts; it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not apposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retai fnull disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, not for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Up With AFM

Six Months of Negotiating End Amicably; A. F. M. By-Laws to Be Changed

New Rork, Dec. 4.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, has signed an agreement with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

The agreement was announced by James C. Petrillo, president of the AFM, who said his organization had amended its by-lays as an inflexible condition by the Boston Symphony for joining the union. All of the 105 members of the Symphony, including Dr. Serge Koussevitszky, its world-famous conductor, become members of the union through the agreement.

Pointing out that all of the 60 symphonies of the United States and Canada were now members of the AFM, Petrillo said he had received authority at an emergency meeting of 18 locals to amend the union by-laws in conformity with the desires of the Boston Symphony.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing Symphony players. For instance a man playing in New Fork who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O. K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engage a conductor and pay him well—in this instance Dr. Koussevitzky. When he says to us as trustees that there there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well'."

Petrillo said the trustees had informed him that unless they were able, by selecting the best musicians regardless of location, to keep up the "high standard" of the orchestra they would rather disband the organization than degrade that standard.

Petrillo said that until he had assured the Boston management that the by-law might be changed the negotiations had been deadlocked but thereafter they proceeded smoothly. He praised the "spirit of fairness" exhibited by Henry Cabot, a trustee. Also participating in the negotiations, he said, were five of the Symphony's musicians elected by the other members.

Other minor changes also were demanded by the Symphony and granted, Petrillo said, but the major result was that all symphonic players now could work in any part of the country where their services might be desired.

Petrillo pointed out that one of the benefits to the Symphony would be its return to the radio and recording studios from which it was barred by the union more than two years ago. Broadcasting and recording contracts would help the Symphony meet its deficit of $180,000 for the past two years. The Symphony also will be able to obtain world famous guest musicians whose services had been denied because of the non-union status.

Petrillo said that the recording privileges, however, could not be exercised until the AFM settled its current strike against radio and recording companies.

There had been no overtures from the radio chains, recording companies or juke box people, he said. Regarding a forthcoming Senate investigation of the union Petrillo said the AFM affairs were "an open book" that it would be "only fair that the industrty (radio) we're dealing with be investigated, but I don't think they want to be."

This Clipping From NILES, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Signs Contract with AFM

NEW YORK —(U.P.)— The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

James C. Petrillo, president of AFM, announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of AFM.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O.K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well."

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the Union for the last two years because of the orchestr's non-union status. recording privilges, however, must be help up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its trike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
DEC 5 - 1942

This Clipping From
KENTON, OHIO
NEWS-REPUBLICAN

...t the desires of a majority of ... members of the orchestra shall ...ermine any demand on the part ... the union respecting their work- ... conditions."

This Clipping From
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS-FREE PRESS
DEC 6 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY SIGNS AGREEMENT WITH UNION

NEW YORK, Dec. 3 (AP).—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. of L., today announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, bringing into the federation the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the United States.

Petrillo said the agreement, covering 105 members of the orchestra, represented a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its by-laws to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada.

Negotiations lasted six months and were conducted by Petrillo for the union, Henry Cabit, trustee of the Boston organization, and a committee of five men from the orchestra.

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
DEC 5 1942

Unionized Symphony In First Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert since becoming unionized paid tribute to Frenchmen who died for the honor of their country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, prefaced Friday's concert by announcing:

"We shall begin with 'La Marseillaise' in memory of the brave French sailors who died heroically aboard their ships for the peace of the world and the honor of France."

The audience applauded the announcement, which was taken to refer to the scuttling of the French fleet at Toulon to prevent its being seized by Germans.

Trustees of the orchestra last night confirmed the announcement of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo had announced that the orchestra, hitherto the only non-union major symphony in the nation, has signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

Commenting on this phase, the trustees said in a statement:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in according them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

This Clipping From
WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
DEC 7 - 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts; it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic com mand to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not apposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retai fnull disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, not for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Up With AFM

Six Months of Negotiating End Amicably; A. F. M. By-Laws to Be Changed

New Rork, Dec. 4.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, has signed an agreement with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

The agreement was announced by James C. Petrillo, president of the AFM, who said his organization had amended its by-lays as an inflexible condition by the Boston Symphony for joining the union. All of the 105 members of the Symphony, including Dr. Serge Koussevitszky, its world-famous conductor, become members of the union through the agreement.

Pointing out that all of the 60 symphonies of the United States and Canada were now members of the AFM, Petrillo said he had received authority at an emergency meeting of 18 locals to amend the union by-laws in conformity with the desires of the Boston Symphony.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing Symphony players. For instance a man playing in New Fork who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O. K. of that loc

"The

me, 'We him w

Koussevitzky. When he says to us as trustees that there there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well'."

Petrillo said the trustees had informed him that unless they were able, by selecting the best musicians regardless of location, to keep up the "high standard" of the orchestra they would rather disband the organization than degrade that standard.

Petrillo said that until he had assured the Boston management that the by-law might be changed the negotiations had been deadlocked but thereafter they proceeded smoothly. He praised the "spirit of fairness" exhibited by Henry Cabot, a trustee. Also participating in the negotiations, he said, were five of the Symphony's musicians elected by the other members.

Other minor changes also were demanded by the Symphony and granted, Petrillo said, but the major result was that all symphonic players now could work in any part of the country where their services might be desired.

Petrillo pointed out that one of its to the Symphony would turn to the radio and re- studios from which it was barred by the union more than two years ago. Broadcasting and recording contracts would help the Symphony meet its deficit of $180,000 for the past two years. The Symphony also will be able to obtain world famous guest musicians whose services had been denied because of the non-union status.

Petrillo said that the recording privileges, however, could not be exercised until the AFM settled its current strike against radio and recording companies.

There had been no overtures from the radio chains, recording companies or juke box people, he said. Regarding a forthcoming Senate investigation of the union Petrillo said the AFM affairs were "an open book" that it would be "only fair that the industrty (radio) we're dealing with be investigated but I don't think they want to be."

t the desires of a majority of members of the orchestra shall ermine any demand on the part the union respecting their work-conditions."

This Clipping From NILES, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Signs Contract with AFM

NEW YORK —(U.P.)— The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

James C. Petrillo, president of AFM, announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of AFM.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O.K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well."

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the Union for the last two years because of the orchestr's non-union status. recording privilges, however, must be help up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its trike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

This Clipping From
WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
DEC 7 - 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts; it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not apposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retai fnull disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, not for the union, but for music.

New York, Dec. 5— (INS.) — The last of the principal musical organizations in the country — the Boston Symphony Orchestra —to become unionized, today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

of between the trustees and the local union "provides

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Unionized Symphony In First Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert ~~since becoming~~ unionized paid tribute to Frenchmen who died for the honor of their country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, prefaced Friday's concert by announcing:

"We shall begin with 'La Marseillaise' in memory of the brave French sailors who died heroically aboard their ships for the peace of the world and the honor of France."

The audience applauded the announcement, which was taken to refer to the scuttling of the French fleet at Toulon to prevent its being seized by Germans.

Trustees of the orchestra last night confirmed the announcement of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo had announced that the orchestra, hitherto the only non-union major symphony in the nation, has signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

Commenting on this phase, the trustees said in a statement:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in according them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1942

Boston Symphony Signs Up With AFM

Six Months of Negotiating End Amicably; A. F. M. By-Laws to Be Changed

New Rork, Dec. 4.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last remaining non-union organization of its kind in the United States, has signed an agreement with the American Federation of Musicians after six months of negotiations.

...ement was announced by ...Petrillo, president of the ...aid his organization had ...by-lays as an inflexible ...the Boston Symphony ...e union. All of the ...the Symphony, in... Koussevitszky, its ...nductor, become ...ion through the

...all of the 60 ...ted States and ...mbers of the ...had received ...cy meeting ...union by- ...he desires

...FM had ...id, "was ...nphony play- ...em- ...t go ...of bared by the union more than two years ago. Broadcasting and recording contracts would help the Symphony meet its deficit of $180,000 for the past two years. The Symphony also will be able to obtain world famous guest musicians whose services had been denied because of the non-union status.

...to ...y

Petrillo said that the recording privileges, however, could not be exercised until the AFM settled its current strike against radio and recording companies.

There had been no overtures from the radio chains, recording companies or juke box people, he said. Regarding a forthcoming Senate investigation of the union Petrillo said the AFM affairs were "an open book" that it would be "only fair that the industrty (radio) we're dealing with be investigated, but I don't think they want to be."

This Clipping From NILES, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Signs Contract with AFM

NEW YORK —(U.P.)— The 105 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, its famous maestro, became members of the American Federation of Musicians today with the signing of a contract between the orchestra management and the AFM.

James C. Petrillo, president of AFM, announced that the contract was signed after his organization had amended its by-laws on a point demanded by the Boston Symphony regarding importation of talent.

Petrillo said that every one of the 60 symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada is now a member of his organization. The authority to change the by-laws in conformity with the request of the Boston organization was given to Petrillo at an extraordinary meeting of the 18 locals of AFM.

"The big item that the AFM had to give way on," Petrillo said, "was the question of importing symphony players. For instance, a man playing in New York who wanted employment in Chicago couldn't go there unless he had the O.K. of that local board.

"The Boston Symphony said to me, 'We engaged a conductor and pay him well—in this instance, Dr. Koussevitzsky. When he says to us as trustees that there is a good man in Chicago, Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, I'd like to employ that man, the Boston local says we can't bring him in because there is a man in Boston who plays as well."

The negotiations for the contract, which began six months ago, were deadlocked, Petrillo said, until he assured the trustees that the by-laws might be changed. They subsequently were.

The Boston Symphony, Petrillo said, may now return to the radio. It had been banned by the Union for the last two years because of the orchestr's non-union status. recording privilges, however, must be help up, Petrillo said, until the union settles its trike pertaining to the playing of recorded music.

...t the desires of a majority of the members of the orchestra shall determine any demand on the part of the union respecting their working conditions."

...NS WITH UNION

Has Been the Sole Hold-Out Among Major Symphonies

BOSTON, Dec. 4-AP-Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra confirmed tonight in an official statement the announcement by James C. Petrillo, President of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL), that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo announced yesterday in New York that the Union and the orchestra, the only non-union group among major symphonies in the nation, had signed a three-year agreement after the Federation amended its by-laws. The orchestra's trustees declined comment until tonight, incident to the Symphony's first concert after signing of the contract.

The trustees' statement said, in part:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in according them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

The statement said that a clause of the contract between the trustees and the local union "provides

This Clipping From BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Unionized Symphony In First Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert since becoming unionized paid tribute to Frenchmen who died for the honor of their country.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, prefaced Friday's concert by announcing:

"We shall begin with 'La Marseillaise' in memory of the brave French sailors who died heroically aboard their ships for the peace of the world and the honor of France."

The audience applauded the announcement, which was taken to refer to the scuttling of the French fleet at Toulon to prevent its being seized by Germans.

Trustees of the orchestra last night confirmed the announcement of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo had announced that the orchestra, hitherto the only non-union major symphony in the nation, has signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

Commenting on this phase, the trustees said in a statement:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in according them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

This Clipping From
WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
DEC 7 - 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts; it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not apposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retai fnull disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, not for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU:

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitzky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

Boston Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without sour notes, and using classic music of France at that.

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
~~PRESS~~ Star
DEC 6 - 1942

This Clipping From
JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1942
Circ. (D 12,595) (S 12,667)

This Clipping From
PORT ARTHUR, TEXAS
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1942

This Clipping From AMARILLO, TEXAS
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 5 — (INS) — The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra — to become unionized, Friday was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1942

—Art And Music Today—

Boston Symphony Signs With Union

BY BETTY A. DIETZ

WHEN James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the part of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permit symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman of the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Harl MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitsky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

Boston Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without sour notes, and using classic music of France at that.

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
PRESS Star
DEC 6 - 1942

This Clipping From
JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1942

Circ. (D 12,595) (S 12,667)
This Clipping From
PORT ARTHUR, TEXAS
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1942

This Clipping From AMARILLO, TEXAS
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1942

Boston Symphony Now Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 5 — (INS) — The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra — to become unionized, Friday was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the well-known

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1942

—Art And Music Today—

Boston Symphony Signs With Union

BY BETTY A. DIETZ

WHEN James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the p[art] of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to perm[it] symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman of the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Hari MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

Boston Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without four notes, and using classic music of France at that.

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitzky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
PRESS Star
DEC 6 - 1942

This Clipping From
JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1942
Circ. (D 12,595) (S 12,667)

This Clipping From
PORT ARTHUR, TEXAS
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1942

BOSTON SY... UNI...

NEW ... RK, ... last of th... princi... music... izations in the country— ...ston Symphony orchestr... to become unionized, toda... was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, resident of the union. Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

...pocket money to a dollar and seven-...pared up a little fund for gifts and ...5 a week and keeping two and half ... is the better manager of the two, ...tra three dollars and seventy-five ...s job, with his fellow employees ...

...c Today—

B... ...ny Si... ...on

WHE... ...TZ of ..., N. J., Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the pa... of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to perm... symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to an... other within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman of the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Harl MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel.

[26]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU:

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitzky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

teeth and tonsils, perhaps resulting to rheumatic and other chronic ailments. Learn the facts. Write today for 122-page, illustrated book on Rectal and Colon Trouble. McCleary Clinic, D1226 Elms Blvd., Excelsior Springs, Mo.—Adv.

ionized—the ...
its kind to do so.

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, announces that the orchestra signed an greement after six months of negotiations. All of the 105 members and the conductor, doctor Serge Koussevitzky, now hold union cards.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

~~Boston~~ Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without sour notes, and using classic music of France at that.

[26]

...s job, with his yellow employees ma... ...tra three dollars and seventy-five ... is the better manager of the two, ...5 a week and keeping two and half ...parded up a little fund for gifts and ...pocket money to a dollar and seven... ...ead of $35

...c Today—

B... ...ny
Si... ...on

...TZ

WHE... ...the American Federation of ..., N. Y., Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the p... of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to perm... symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to an... other within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman of the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Harl MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitzky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

Boston Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without sour notes, and using classic music of France at that.

PANY

CONFIRM UNION STEP

Boston, Dec. 5 (AP)—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have confirmed in an official statement the announcement by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL), that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo said yesterday in New York that the union and the orchestra, the only non-union group among major symphonies in the nation, had signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

The trustees' statement said, in part:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recog-

...s job, with his fellow employees mak-
...ra three dollars and seventy-five
... is the better manager of the two,
...5 a week and keeping two and half
...ared up a little fund for gifts and
...pocket money to a dollar and seven-
... contract of $35

c Today—

B... ny Si... on

WHE... TZ of ..., AFL, Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the p... of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to perm... symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to an... other within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman pf the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Harl MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel.

[26]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
DEC 7 - 1942

Caesar's Triumph

James Caesar Petrillo and the Boston Symphony last week finally came to terms. The only major symphony in the United States not affiliated with Petrillo's American Federation of Musicians reached an agreement with the AFM, ending one of the bitterest unionization fights in music.

Like most negotiated peace treaties, this one resulted from months of argument and compromise. The major points at issue were whether the conductor—Serge Koussevitsky—could fire in the interests of discipline and hire new men from outside the local union.

The AFM's constitution gives the ever-jealous locals power to see to it that virtually no musicians but their members are considered for vacancies. Although this by-law has never been fully enforced and many exceptions have always been made, the Boston orchestra's trustees felt that existence of the provision was a threat to the symphony's artistic integrity. Only the best musicians, they insisted, would be hired, regardless of where they came from. With an agreement reached, both sides could claim a victory—the orchestra because, it was reported, this clause was modified to permit hiring of musicians from other cities besides Boston; the union, because an anti-union citadel had fallen when the symphony's trustees accepted the principles of unionism and collective bargaining.

Settlement solves many difficulties which plagued the orchestra through the battle. It can now hire world-famous guest artists, most of whom are AFM members and hence have been barred from such appearances. The symphony can now tour without fear that Petrillo will threaten, as he has many times, to blacklist any concert hall it uses. And, most important of all, the orchestra can now broadcast and make phonograph records (once Petrillo settles his present ban on disk manufacture) and so raise new revenues to avert part of an expected $188,000 deficit. The Boston's independent attitude always stemmed from a healthy bank account; its present unpledged deficit was brought about by the death last April of Ernest B. Dane, its chief benefactor.

It is already negotiating a radio contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, which should bring in about $75,000. Such a contract would mean that the orchestra's recordings would also be under the Columbia label, since the record company is a subsidiary of the broadcasting system. The Boston was under contract to RCA-Victor until Petrillo forced the symphony off disks in August 1940.

This Clipping From
TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 7 - 1942

MU

Boston Joins the Union

One of the longest struggles in U.S. labor history last week came to an end. Sergei Koussevitzky's superb Boston Symphony, only surviving major non-union orchestra in the U.S., finally knuckled under to Boss James Caesar Petrillo's Federation of Musicians.

Ever since it was founded in 1881 by aristocratic, union-hating Major Henry Lee Higginson, the Boston Symphony had rebuffed all efforts at unionization. A strike over the issue in 1920 was quelled by the management at great expense to U.S. symphonic music when some 31 strikers left. Conductor Koussevitzky managed to rebuild the orchestra to the highest level. Two years ago Boss Petrillo barred the Bostonians from radio and recording studios under a threat to pull all union musicians out of the studios. Like most U.S. symphony orchestras, the Bostonians had come to depend less and less on wealthy patronage, more and more on broadcasting and recording fees. After two years off the air, the Symphony's trustees threw in the sponge, signed a union contract. Petrillo had won again.

From Boss Petrillo the Bostonians wrung one special concession: Unlike other U.S. symphony orchestras, the Boston will be able to hire union musicians from outside Boston's Local No. 9 without special permission. One expected result of the union agreement is the signing of an estimated $75,000 broadcasting contract with Columbia Broadcasting System.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 7 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY, NOW AFL, SIGNS BROADCAST CONTRACT

NEW YORK, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air, after an absence of five years, on Dec. 26 under a long term contract with the Blue network, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts will be broadcast weekly during the symphony's 46-week season over the 145-station network. Most will originate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is planned to carry the concerts from the Charles River esplanade beginning in May.

The symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, became the last major symphony orchestra in the nation to become a member of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL) with announcement of the signing last Thursday by Federation President James C. Petrillo. Petrillo had said the contract would permit the orchestra to return to the radio.

This Clipping From
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1942

Topics of the Day

Be sure and mail your Christmas cards early, as well.

Of course none of the can openers got mixed up in that second carload of tin cans, off to the de-tinner's.

Wonder if Churchill had prepared his Bradford speech ahead of the latest news from Tunisia.

Boston Symphony played its first concert after being unionized without sour notes, and using classic music of France at that.

[26]

PANY

CONFIRM UNION STEP

Boston, Dec. 5 (AP)—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have confirmed in an official statement the announcement by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL), that the orchestra had entered into a contract with the union.

Petrillo said yesterday in New York that the union and the orchestra, the only non-union group among major symphonies in the nation, had signed a three-year agreement after the federation amended its by-laws.

The trustees' statement said, in part:

"The most important change in the by-laws of the American Federation of Musicians is that which recognizes symphony orchestras, in effect, as in a special category, in accordance them the right to call players from other parts of the country outside the jurisdiction of the local union."

The statement said that a clause of the contract between the trustees and the local union "provides that the desires of a majority of the members of the orchestra shall determine any demand on the part of the union respecting their working conditions."

c Today—

ny

on

WHE... TZ ... the American Federation of ..., Thursday announced the signing of a three-year agreement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, he marked the end of a long and bitter fight between the union and the orchestra which was for years the only major non-union symphony orchestra in the country. Negotiations alone, in fact, had gone on for the last six months.

Prime reason for the orchestra's refusal to sign with the union previously, we understand, was that the orchestra's founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson would have preferred to let the group dissolve before permitting agreement with the union.

What seems of major importance in the announcement is that the arrangement will benefit both parties in the agreement and that the union has yielded more than a small amount of ground. The new arrangement is said to be able to raise standards of orchestra personnel and symphonic performances the country over.

Interestingly enough, it was more than sentiment for the artistic that brought about the collective action, for the orchestra was facing an economic problem of serious proportions. And it was just as important to the union to win over the finest existing symphony, actually the only orchestra which had managed to hold out against the union and the pressures it had enforced. The union had an ace up its sleeve, however, since it could, by issuing an edict to the radio and record companies, force those groups to cease contact with the Boston symphony. And it was these contracts with the radio and record companies which were responsible for much of the Boston orchestra's recent revenues. Through these funds alone, since most of the private backing was denied the Boston orchestra at the time of the death of its president, Ernest B. Dane, would the orchestra be able to maintain a balanced budget.

According to a news dispatch received here, the agreement covers 105 members of the orchestra and represents a concession on the p... of the federation, in that the union amended its bylaws to permi... symphony musicians to move from one symphony jurisdiction to another within the United States and Canada. A report given to Olin Downes, which appeared in the New York Times, if correct, reveals that a man, if not considered adequate to the needs, may be replaced by a player from another union local in another city. In the past such changes have been made only under great difficulties and against frequently unalterable opposition. This new interpretation will mean, if followed through, an eventual development of higher standards of performance within the union and the end of efforts to shield second or third-class players by putting the principle of jobs above that of artistic ability.

* * * *

The Gilbert and Sullivan Opera company will perform at the Cox theater in Cincinnati, the week of Jan. 10, the following operattas: "The Mikado," "Iolanthe," "Yeoman of the Guards," "Trial by Jury," "H. M. S. Pinafore" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

* * *

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony will celebrate its 100th anniversary Sunday, under the direction of Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and is scheduled to play two numbers which were part of the inaugural concert of the orchestra, then the New York Philharmonic, Dec. 7, 1842. They are the overture to Weber's "Oberon," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The balance of Rodzinski's program consists of the new Harl MacDonald symphonic poem, "Bataan," and the Largo and final movement from Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

The orchestra had been organized in the preceding spring and gave its first concert in the Apollo chambers on Lower Broadway. The opening concert was directed by Ureli Corelli Hill, a Connecticut yankee who had established a reputation as an enthusiastic organizer, violinist and conductor.

The audience was escorted to its seats by members of the orchestra who wore white gloves and carried staffs as symbols of their office. The orchestra, with the exception of the cellists, stood as it played. At that time the ensemble consisted of 63 instrumentalists, in striking contrast to the more than 100 players who now form its personnel.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
DEC 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 15 1942

y our column
e unioniza-
ra. I call ted in fine
the union
ny.
EPNER.

This Clipping From
GREENVILLE, S. C.
PIEDMONT
DEC

Circ. (D 26,723)

This Clipping From OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
DEC 12 1942

Boston Symphony Member of Union

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has joined the Musicians' Union!

It is said the union on its side has yielded some very important points on procedure to the orchestra. "The arrangement is such as to benefit both parties to the agreement, and to raise the standard of orchestra personnel and symphonic performance throughout the country," according to Olin Downes, noted American critic.

Mr. Downes adds:

"The orchestra faced an economic problem which was anything but a simple one. The union faced a situation which made it imperative that the finest existing symphony orchestra, and the one orchestra which had quietly and successfully resisted up to the present time every pressure to force it to do so, should come into the fold. One of the union's cards in the game might be designated as force majeur, in the form of the edict it could issue to the radio and record companies, forbidding them under the letter of contractual agreement to cease broadcasting or record-making of Boston Symphony performances.

"It was a powerful weapon in the situation but not one to which the Boston Symphony would necessarily have yielded if it had not been able to secure modifications in union regulations of the past affecting the orchestra's rights in the engagement of players, the adjustment of rehearsal hours and associated matters which could affect standards of personnel and performance, and the complete freedom of the organization to pursue its artistic purposes unhindered by union red tape or supervision. It is distinctly to the credit of Mr. Petrillo and his colleagues that they saw the point, realized the temper of the organization with which they were dealing and sufficiently modified their conditions to change the whole orchestral situation in this country."

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the Country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable.

The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestra appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 12 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiations in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The acual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Green, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part, expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Green had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
DEC 8 - 1942

What Others Say

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

[Christian Science Monitor]

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

Compromise Wins

Whatever the reactions may be to the ending of the long controversy between the American Federation of Musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is pleasing that the differences that have so long existed, growing out of the attempt to unionize the organization, have been ended and that the public will be in position to attend concerts by this orchestra, here or elsewhere, without the imputation of being unduly sympathetic with unorganized "labor."

A much larger number of music lovers who lack the opportunity to attend the orchestra's concerts will rejoice that it is to return to the air both for this Symphony Hall season and the concerts from the Charles River Espianade during the outdoor season. The radio hookup involved in the contract with the National Broadcasting Company assures wide hearing for its programs, something that will strengthen radio in its cultural upper brackets.

Settlement on some basis of the issues that have kept the orchestra and federation in opposed camps had been forecast for some time, largely because of the whip hand held by James C. Petrillo, head of the federation, which extended finally to his threat of a blacklist on halls that were opened to the nonunion orchestra. This, as will be remembered, brought the federation into conflict with the Springfield City Property Committee, which refused to ban the use of the Auditorium here to the orchestra for a scheduled concert the coming season. The backbone exhibited by the committee was widely commended, though the settlement of the controversy happily will prevent any necessity for a showdown.

Important concessions have been made by Petrillo in the compromise the most important result of which is the orchestra's players will become union members. One of these is the lifting of restrictions on the recruiting of players, who now may be enlisted wherever they are obtainable, a concession of great importance to an organization of the high standard of the Boston Symphony.

The outcome as a whole appears to be reason for congratulation on both sides. A clean-cut victory for either side seemed in the category of the irresistible force and the immovable object. In such a case a compromise was the only way out. The trustees of the orchestra, who had the deciding voice, appeared to take that view. The decision removes the Boston orchestra from the somewhat anomalous position of being the sole union holdout among the first rank musical organizations. It is clearly a case of "—" well that ends well." Face is saved by both sides the public, wherever its sympathies have been, continue to enjoy the music of this great orches

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
HERALD
DEC 8 - 1942

UNIONIZING A SYMPHONY

On the face of it, the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to be defeated. At any rate, it has signed a contract with the American Federation of Labor, a procedure against which it has waged war for many years.

The orchestra was enabled to stay out of the union's ranks in the first place because its founder and financer, Henry L. Higginson, took exclusive care of the economic part of the orchestra's career. When he died, Ernest B. Dane took over; and he, too, did not care to deal with labor unions. And so the orchestra could keep on existing although life was made increasingly hard since it was barred from radio appearances or making records. Many of the famous solo artists could not appear with it; and when the orchestra went on tour, it experienced difficulty in finding halls—all because of union pressure.

At length Mr. Dane died and the orchestra seemed on the brink of financial disacter. It was then that the president of the board of trustees indicated that the Boston Symphony orchestra would consent to unionization were its artistic standards assured. He asked that full power of employing, discharging and discipline be placed in the hands of the conductor.

And here, just at the point where the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to have been defeated, it has won something of a victory not only for itself but for other major symphony orchestras. For James C. Petrillo, president of the union, changed some of the existing by-laws so that the requirements were met. It is believed that better orchestral music will be the result.

[27]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
DEC 8 - 1942

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 15 1942

This Clipping From
GREENVILLE, S. C.
PIEDMONT
DEC [illegible]

Orchestra Unionized

NEW YORK, Dec. 8—(INS)—The last of the principal musical organizations in the country—the Boston Symphony Orchestra —to become [illegible] today was signed up with the American Federation of Musicians.

Announcement of the agreement, which affects 105 members of the orchestra, was made by James C. Petrillo, president of the union.

Also covered by the contract, although he did not enter into negotiations, was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the well-known orchestra.

orchestra is composed of very intelligent men and they will take an active interest in the union. That will be good, also, for the union."

Of James C. Petrillo, president of the union, who threatened to boycott the Eastman Theatre if the orchestra played there without a union agreement, Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"He's a very able man in his line. For his union he did a splendid job."

Dr. Koussevitzky himself organized the first musicians' union in Russia in 1902 and later belonged to a musicians' union in Paris, he remarked.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 12 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiations in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The acual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Green, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part, expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Green had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

Compromise Wins

Wh[illegible] the reactions may be to the ending of the long controversy between the American Federation of Musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is pleasing that the differences that have so long existed, growing out of the attempt to unionize the organization, have been ended and that the public will be in position to attend concerts by this orchestra, here or elsewhere, without the imputation of being unduly sympathetic with unorganized "labor."

A much larger number of music lovers who lack the opportunity to attend the orchestra's concerts will rejoice that it is to return to the air both for this Symphony Hall season and the concerts from the Charles River Espianade during the outdoor season. The radio hookup involved in the contract with the National Broadcasting Company assures wide hearing for its programs, something that will strengthen radio in its cultural upper brackets.

Settlement on some basis of the issues that have kept the orchestra and federation in opposed camps had been forecast for some time, largely because of the whip hand held by James C. Petrillo, head of the federation, which extended finally to his threat of a blacklist on halls that were opened to the nonunion orchestra. This, as will be remembered, brought the federation into conflict with the Springfield City Property Committee, which refused to ban the use of the Auditorium here to the orchestra for a scheduled concert the coming season. The backbone exhibited by the committee was widely commended, though the settlement of the controversy happily will prevent any necessity for a showdown.

Important concessions have been made by Petrillo in the compromise the most important result of which is the orchestra's players will become union members. One of these is the lifting of restrictions on the recruiting of players, who now may be enlisted wherever they are obtainable, a concession of great importance to an organization of the high standard of the Boston Symphony.

The outcome as a whole appears to be reason for congratulation on both sides. A clean-cut victory for either side seemed in the category of the irresistible force and the immovable object. In such a case a compromise was the only way out. The trustees of the orchestra, who had the deciding voice, appeared to take that view. The decision removes the Boston orchestra from the somewhat anomalous position of being the sole union holdout among the first rank musical organizations. It is clearly a case of "all's well that ends well." Face is saved by both sides and the public, wherever its sympathies have been, will continue to enjoy the music of this great orchestra.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
HERALD
DEC 8 - 1942

UNIONIZING A SYMPHONY

On the face of it, the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to be defeated. At any rate, it has signed a contract with the American Federation of Labor, a procedure against which it has waged war for many years.

The orchestra was enabled to stay out of the union's ranks in the first place because its founder and financer, Henry L. Higginson, took exclusive care of the economic part of the orchestra's career. When he died, Ernest B. Dane took over; and he, too, did not care to deal with labor unions. And so the orchestra could keep on existing although life was made increasingly hard since it was barred from radio appearances or making records. Many of the famous solo artists could not appear with it; and when the orchestra went on tour, it experienced difficulty in finding halls—all because of union pressure.

At length Mr. Dane died and the orchestra seemed on the brink of financial disacter. It was then that the president of the board of trustees indicated that the Boston Symphony orchestra would consent to unionization were its artistic standards assured. He asked that full power of employing, discharging and discipline be placed in the hands of the conductor.

And here, just at the point where the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to have been defeated, it has won something of a victory not only for itself but for other major symphony orchestras. For James C. Petrillo, president of the union, changed some of the existing by-laws so that the requirements were met. It is believed that better orchestral music will be the result.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
DEC 8 - 1942

What Others Say

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

[Christian Science Monitor]

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestra appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
DEC 12 19[illegible]

Unionized Symphony

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the Country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable.

[27]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 12 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiations in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The acual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Green, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part, expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Green had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

Compromise Wins

Whatever the reactions may be to the ending of the long controversy between the American Federation of Musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is pleasing that the differences that have so long existed, growing out of the attempt to unionize the organization, have been ended and that the public will be in position to attend concerts by this orchestra, here or elsewhere, without the imputation of being unduly sympathetic with unorganized "labor."

A much larger number of music lovers who lack the opportunity to attend the orchestra's concerts will rejoice that it is to return to the air both for this Symphony Hall season and the concerts from the Charles River Espianade during the outdoor season. The radio hookup involved in the contract with the National Broadcasting Company assures wide hearing for its programs, something that will strengthen radio in its cultural upper brackets.

Settlement on some basis of the issues that have kept the orchestra and federation in opposed camps had been forecast for some time, largely because of the whip hand held by James C. Petrillo, head of the federation, which extended finally to his threat of a blacklist on halls that were opened to the nonunion orchestra. This, as will be remembered, brought the federation into conflict with the Springfield City Property Committee, which refused to ban the use of the Auditorium here to the orchestra for a scheduled concert the coming season. The backbone exhibited by the committee was widely commended, though the settlement of the controversy happily will prevent any necessity for a showdown.

Important concessions have been made by Petrillo in the compromise the most important result of which is the orchestra's players will become union members. One of these is the lifting of restrictions on the recruiting of players, who now may be enlisted wherever they are obtainable, a concession of great importance to an organization of the high standard of the Boston Symphony.

The outcome as a whole appears to be reason for congratulation on both sides. A clean-cut victory for either side seemed in the category of the irresistible force and the immovable object. In such a case a compromise was the only way out. The trustees of the orchestra, who had the deciding voice, appeared to take that view. The decision removes the Boston orchestra from the somewhat anomalous position of being the sole union holdout among the first rank musical organizations. It is clearly a case of "all's well that ends well." Face is saved by both sides and the public, wherever its sympathies have been, will continue to enjoy the music of this great orchestra.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
HERALD
DEC 8 - 1942

UNIONIZING A SYMPHONY

On the face of it, the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to be defeated. At any rate, it has signed a contract with the American Federation of Labor, a procedure against which it has waged war for many years.

The orchestra was enabled to stay out of the union's ranks in the first place because its founder and financer, Henry L. Higginson, took exclusive care of the economic part of the orchestra's career. When he died, Ernest B. Dane took over; and he, too, did not care to deal with labor unions. And so the orchestra could keep on existing although life was made increasingly hard since it was barred from radio appearances or making records. Many of the famous solo artists could not appear with it; and when the orchestra went on tour, it experienced difficulty in finding halls—all because of union pressure.

At length Mr. Dane died and the orchestra seemed on the brink of financial disacter. It was then that the president of the board of trustees indicated that the Boston Symphony orchestra would consent to unionization were its artistic standards assured. He asked that full power of employing, discharging and discipline be placed in the hands of the conductor.

And here, just at the point where the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to have been defeated, it has won something of a victory not only for itself but for other major symphony orchestras. For James C. Petrillo, president of the union, changed some of the existing by-laws so that the requirements were met. It is believed that better orchestral music will be the result.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

...our column
...unioniza-
...ra. I call
...ted in fine
...the union
...ny.
...EPNER.

...II—All is harmony between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, which gave a concert here tonight.

"I think it's good for the union that the Boston Symphony has joined and it is also good for the orchestra," the conductor said. "The agreement will make it possible for the orchestra to do radio concerts, which will wipe out a $100,000 deficit and will also enable us to make recordings. That will be good for the orchestra. The orchestra is composed of very intelligent men and they will take an active interest in the union. That will be good, also, for the union."

Of James C. Petrillo, president of the union, who threatened to boycott the Eastman Theatre if the orchestra played there without a union agreement, Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"He's a very able man in his line. For his union he did a splendid job."

Dr. Koussevitzky himself organized the first musicians' union in Russia in 1902 and later belonged to a musicians' union in Paris, he remarked.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
DEC 8 - 1942

What Others Say

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

[Christian Science Monitor]

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
DEC 12 19

The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestra appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

Unionized Symphony

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the Country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable.

[27]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

Compromise Wins

Wh[illegible] the reactions may be to the ending of the long controversy between the American Federation of Musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is pleasing that the differences that have so long existed, growing out of the attempt to unionize the organization, have been ended and that the public will be in position to attend concerts by this orchestra, here or elsewhere, without the imputation of being unduly sympathetic with unorganized "labor."

A much larger number of music lovers who lack the opportunity to attend the orchestra's concerts will rejoice that it is to return to the air both for this Symphony Hall season and the concerts from the Charles River Espianade during the outdoor season. The radio hookup involved in the contract with the National Broadcasting Company assures wide hearing for its programs, something that will strengthen radio in its cultural upper brackets.

Settlement on some basis of the issues that have kept the orchestra and federation in opposed camps had been forecast for some time, largely because of the whip hand held by James C. Petrillo, head of the federation, which extended finally to his threat of a blacklist on halls that were opened to the nonunion orchestra. This, as will be remembered, brought the federation into conflict with the Springfield City Property Committee, which refused to ban the use of the Auditorium here to the orchestra for a scheduled concert the coming season. The backbone exhibited by the committee was widely commended, though the settlement of the controversy happily will prevent any necessity for a showdown.

Important concessions have been made by Petrillo in the compromise the most important result of which is the orchestra's players will become union members. One of these is the lifting of restrictions on the recruiting of players, who now may be enlisted wherever they are obtainable, a concession of great importance to an organization of the high standard of the Boston Symphony.

The outcome as a whole appears to be reason for congratulation on both sides. A clean-cut victory for either side seemed in the category of the irresistible force and the immovable object. In such a case a compromise was the only way out. The trustees of the orchestra, who had the deciding voice, appeared to take that view. The decision removes the Boston orchestra from the somewhat anomalous position of being the sole union holdout among the first rank musical organizations. It is clearly a case of "all's well that ends well." Face is saved by both sides and the public, wherever its sympathies have been, will continue to enjoy the music of this great orchestra.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
DEC 8 - 1942

The Boston Symphony

To The Journal: I appreciated your column on Thanksgiving day concerning the unionization of the Boston symphony orchestra. I call that coverage. For everybody interested in fine musical performances was following the union negotiations with the Boston symphony.

BERNARD STEPNER.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 12 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC
(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiations in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The acual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Green, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part, expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Green had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
HERALD
DEC 8 - 1942

UNIONIZING A SYMPHONY

On the face of it, the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to be defeated. At any rate, it has signed a contract with the American Federation of Labor, a procedure against which it has waged war for many years.

The orchestra was enabled to stay out of the union's ranks in the first place because its founder and financer, Henry L. Higginson, took exclusive care of the economic part of the orchestra's career. When he died, Ernest B. Dane took over; and he, too, did not care to deal with labor unions. And so the orchestra could keep on existing although life was made increasingly hard since it was barred from radio appearances or making records. Many of the famous solo artists could not appear with it; and when the orchestra went on tour, it experienced difficulty in finding halls—all because of union pressure.

At length Mr. Dane died and the orchestra seemed on the brink of financial disacter. It was then that the president of the board of trustees indicated that the Boston Symphony orchestra would consent to unionization were its artistic standards assured. He asked that full power of employing, discharging and discipline be placed in the hands of the conductor.

And here, just at the point where the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to have been defeated, it has won something of a victory not only for itself but for other major symphony orchestras. For James C. Petrillo, president of the union, changed some of the existing by-laws so that the requirements were met. It is believed that better orchestral music will be the result.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
DEC 8 - 1942

What Others Say

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC
[Christian Science Monitor]

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union. but for music.

The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestra appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
DEC 12 19[illegible]

Unionized Symphony

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the Country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable.

[27]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

...scheduled for Dec. 26. Thereafter the orchestra will be heard each week.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 12 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC
(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiations in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The acual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Green, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part, expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Green had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 8 - 1942

Compromise Wins

Whatever the reactions may be to the ending of the long controversy between the American Federation of Musicians and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is pleasing that the differences that have so long existed, growing out of the attempt to unionize the organization, have been ended and that the public will be in position to attend concerts by this orchestra, here or elsewhere, without the imputation of being unduly sympathetic with unorganized "labor."

A much larger number of music lovers who lack the opportunity to attend the orchestra's concerts will rejoice that it is to return to the air both for this Symphony Hall season and the concerts from the Charles River Espianade during the outdoor season. The radio hookup involved in the contract with the National Broadcasting Company assures wide hearing for its programs, something that will strengthen radio in its cultural upper brackets.

Settlement on some basis of the issues that have kept the orchestra and federation in opposed camps had been forecast for some time, largely because of the whip hand held by James C. Petrillo, head of the federation, which extended finally to his threat of a blacklist on halls that were opened to the nonunion orchestra. This, as will be remembered, brought the federation into conflict with the Springfield City Property Committee, which refused to ban the use of the Auditorium here to the orchestra for a scheduled concert the coming season. The backbone exhibited by the committee was widely commended, though the settlement of the controversy happily will prevent any necessity for a showdown.

Important concessions have been made by Petrillo in the compromise the most important result of which is the orchestra's players will become union members. One of these is the lifting of restrictions on the recruiting of players, who now may be enlisted wherever they are obtainable, a concession of great importance to an organization of the high standard of the Boston Symphony.

The outcome as a whole appears to be reason for congratulation on both sides. A clean-cut victory for either side seemed in the category of the irresistible force and the immovable object. In such a case a compromise was the only way out. The trustees of the orchestra, who had the deciding voice, appeared to take that view. The decision removes the Boston orchestra from the somewhat anomalous position of being the sole union holdout among the first rank musical organizations. It is clearly a case of "all's well that ends well." Face is saved by both sides and the public, wherever its sympathies have been, will continue to enjoy the music of this great orchestra.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
DEC 8 - 1942

What Others Say

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

[Christian Science Monitor]

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: It brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on, the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
HERALD
DEC 8 - 1942

UNIONIZING A SYMPHONY

On the face of it, the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to be defeated. At any rate, it has signed a contract with the American Federation of Labor, a procedure against which it has waged war for many years.

The orchestra was enabled to stay out of the union's ranks in the first place because its founder and financer, Henry L. Higginson, took exclusive care of the economic part of the orchestra's career. When he died, Ernest B. Dane took over; and he, too, did not care to deal with labor unions. And so the orchestra could keep on existing although life was made increasingly hard since it was barred from radio appearances or making records. Many of the famous solo artists could not appear with it; and when the orchestra went on tour, it experienced difficulty in finding halls—all because of union pressure.

At length Mr. Dane died and the orchestra seemed on the brink of financial disacter. It was then that the president of the board of trustees indicated that the Boston Symphony orchestra would consent to unionization were its artistic standards assured. He asked that full power of employing, discharging and discipline be placed in the hands of the conductor.

And here, just at the point where the Boston Symphony orchestra would seem to have been defeated, it has won something of a victory not only for itself but for other major symphony orchestras. For James C. Petrillo, president of the union, changed some of the existing by-laws so that the requirements were met. It is believed that better orchestral music will be the result.

The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestra appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
DEC 12 19...

Unionized Symphony

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the Country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable.

[27]

EAST BAY LABOR
JOURNAL
OAKLAND, CAL
12/11/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

The Boston symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American federation of musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
FAYETTEVILLE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 1 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred [illegible] playing the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

TORONTO, CANADA
STAR
DEC 12 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS JOINED UNION

Only Non-Union Great Orchestra in America Now in Radio Family

Boston Symphony, which has been non-union all its life under nine conductors, has now joined the union. Negotiations lasted six months. Boston held out for a concession allowing the orchestra to hire its players from any local union in the U.S. or Canada. The concession being granted automatically permits any symphony orchestra to engage players from anywhere in North America. European engagees are treated individually.

Twenty-five years ago Stokowski said in Toronto that he would know Boston Symphony blindfold by its tone. He spoke of the great orchestra endowed by the late Col. Higginson, but since his death a straight competitive concern, as though it were an institution as much in its own class as the Mendelssohn Choir was among choral societies. One distinction of the Boston Symphony was that in all the evolution of musical unionism in America to a point of almost absolute domination of orchestras by the W.P.A., the players conducted by Koussevitsky were the only regular-symphonic body of instrumental non-union musicians in America.

Since radio became such a big factor in orchestra revenues, the Boston Symphony found itself under a handicap by the 1940 edict of James Petrillo, head of the W.P.A., threatening to withdraw any union players from groups doing business with the Boston Symphony. As radio playing is vital to a great orchestra, this was probably the main reason why Boston joined the union.

Twenty years ago great orchestras played to only local audiences in their home cities and on tour. Now a great orchestra can be heard from its own hall all over America. Boston Orchestra was first on the air, back in 1926. Since 1937 it has been off the air. The first broadcast is Dec. 26 from 9.15 to 10.15 over Blue Network and 145 stations.

Boston Symphony Orchestra a Necessity

To the Editor of The Herald:

Can it really happen here—that we may lose the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of lack of public support? How many people, I wonder, saw the British sailor at last Friday's concert, listening, with his head on his arms, transported by the Beethoven Concerto to a world of beauty? Haven't we all gone home from the concerts moved and resolved that such music represents the best effort of man? When the city of London was being destroyed, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played for us the London Symphony, and we knew then that London could never really be destroyed—the very issues of the war and the vision of peace were burnt as clear as fire on us who heard that concert.

This year we have heard the Shostakovitch Symphony, written during the attack on Moscow. And, as always, we have heard German music—Beethoven, Bach, Brahms, Haydn. No good music comes from Germany now, but some day again, perhaps, it will. In London during the worst days, Myra Hess gave music at noontime to the tired people of London, people who had to sleep underground like rats. These concerts at the National Gallery were packed. This music was a healing force, more than that, it kept tragedy and deadly discomfort from engulfing their lives, they were able to put first things first.

Can it mean that we who have just begun to be touched by the war are not recognizing what "first things" are? That we must not let Boston's greatest artistic achievement just slip through our fingers because we haven't the sense to see what we shall be missing?

It is not just a rich people's orchestra—it plays for all of us. We know it is the finest orchestra in the world now and that Dr. Koussevitzky is the greatest conductor. We must tell them this before it is too late.

INA R. WHITE.

Chestnut Hill.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
12/14/42

Word comes from Boston that, following its treaty of peace with James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has solved some of its financial problems by signing a recording contract with RCA Victor. This will also include the recording of performances by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

To Symphony Hall, last evening, returned George Szell to lead the Symphony Orchestra once more in the programme that he offered here at a recent pair of "regular" concerts: Schubert's Symphony in C major, the conductor's admirable orchestral transcription of Smetana's string quartet, "From My Life," and that composer's tone poem, "The Moldau." This programme will be heard for a fourth time this afternoon.

Once more Mr. Szell showed himself to be a conductor of authority and imagination and, withal, an admirable musician. Schubert's Symphony in his hands is pointed up, but this over-played, over-long work can stand such treatment. With the music of his countrymen, Smetana, Mr. Szell is on less debatable ground. No other conductor has yet attempted his version of the quartet, but it is hard to see how it could be surpassed, and "The Moldau" is certainly his dish. The orchestra played with the utmost brilliance throughout and the audience was appropriately enthusiastic.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

George Szell was the guest conductor last evening for the fifth program of the "shorter" series of Boston Symphony concerts, offering exhilarating, imaginative interpretations of the same works which he conducted at the regular concerts of Jan. 29-30.

It is not a particularly adventuresome program, which includes Schubert's Symphony No. 7 in C major and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," although Mr. Szell departs from convention with his own extraordinarily sensitive and effective orchestral version of Smetana's String Quartet No. 1 in E minor, "From My Life." But it is a program musically perfect, emotionally fresh, springlike and richly rewarding. Both the audience and the men of the orchestra gave Mr. Szell an ovation at the close of the Schubert.

Mr. Szell has a flair for outlining the architecture of a piece by giving it rhymthmic impetus (which is never headlong) and by selecting tempi that are inevitably right. Last evening he received electric responses from the orchestra which played with clarity, precision and the famous Boston Symphony brilliance and depth of tone. The orchestral choirs were maintained in a wonderfully delicate balance.

There was much charm, expressiveness and beauty of detail in the Schubert. It was also exciting.

Smetana's Quartet, avowedly an experiment in dramatic program music of chamber proportions, is extremely difficult to play in its original version. It has always seemed, to most critics, to be too big for its boots. In Mr. Szell's orchestral version it becomes a large dramatic work of grip and force, as well as of quiet beauty. As with "The Moldau," which closed the program, Mr. Szell made it flow, whirl and sing on in a cloud of lovely sound.

The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.—J. W. R.

[28]

Globe
Nov 22

MUSIC

By ELINOR HUGHES

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 11th regular concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the program being as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov.....Introduction and Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"
Moussorgsky...Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Shostakovitch.....Symphony No. 6
Wagner...Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"
Wagner...Prelude to "[illegible]"

Any pleasanter manner to start the New Year than at a first rate concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be impossible to imagine, and yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians were in the best possible form in their presentation of a program of generally familiar music, Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony being the only relatively novel composition. For the rest, there were contributions by Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, to swing the balance to matters Russian, and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and the stirring Prelude to "Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg," which brought the afternoon to a festive and loudly applauded close.

Last season the Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony underwent no less than six performances at these concerts—counting the Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon programs as separate entities—but yesterday marked its initial hearing this season. Comparisons, invidious and exasperating as they always are, cannot be escaped with Shostakovitch, who is, when you come down to it, his own most interesting rival. Prior to the hearing of the Sixth Symphony, there was the heated discussion over the Fifth—which still is a bone of musical contention—and last year we had the Seventh over which to argue, a composition impossible to judge dispassionately at the time of its performance here owing to the circumstances involving its composition.

The Sixth Symphony does not, I think, require to be judged in the light either of heated controversy or of earth-shaking historical events. Unconventional in form, with the very long first movement—a form employed also in the Seventh Symphony—and the short allegro and presto, it is not so much polemical or proselytizing as it is strongly individual, generally melodious and often romantic in style. The prolonged largo seems, on additional hearings, to be drawn out beyond the strength of its thematic material, though there is no denying the tonal beauty of the long passages for English horn and flute, under which weave the ground work of trills by the low strings in long pedal points. The second movement, the allegro, which has the character of a scherzo though it is not so called, is lively, rhythmic and entertaining, the piccolo and E-flat clarinet contributing admirable solos; and the presto, with which the symphony ends, is written in the form of a rondo and maintains an irresistible folk-dance rhythm throughout. Conductor and orchestra combined to give an eloquent and spirited performance of the entire work, and the soloists deserve especially high praise.

The two shorter Russian works with which the program opened were cleverly contrasted in mood, for the "Coq d'Or" music has a wonderful objective brilliance and color, while the "Khovanstchina" prelude is delicate and subtle in its suggestion of polyphonic voices. Tranquil and poetic, the "Siegfried Idyll," not heard at these concerts for seven years, presents Wagner in a highly sympathetic mood, just as the "Meistersinger" prelude shows him fairly dancing in the streets. The audience, as might have been expected, was most enthusiastic.

The Boston Symphony will be out of town next week, and the next pair of concerts will take place at Symphony Hall, Jan. 15 and 16, at which time the conductor will be Richard Burgin and Robert Casadesus will be soloist in the Saint-Saens Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor. The remainder of the program will consist of Reznicek's Overture to "Donna Diana" and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Jean Lefranc as soloists.

Yesterday as last March, the Symphony was performed in the slightly revised version made by Shostakovich for publication of the score.

Next week the orchestra goes again to New York. The next Boston concerts, Jan. 15 and 16, will be conducted by Richard Burgin, whose progoram will be: Overture to "Donna Diana," Reznicek; "Don Quixote," by Strauss, with Jean Bedetti 'cello soloist; Fourth Piano Concerto, Saint-Saens, Robert Casadesus, soloist.—C. W. D.

Post MU
SYMPHON
Boston Symph

The concert at yesterday afternoo Symphony Orchest magnificent. If it for the New Year, ly in for memorab Mr. Koussevitzk good program for sisting mostly of there was nothing also nothing to w listen very hard, ap movement of Shos Symphony. All th to absorb — the Wedding March fro by Rimsky-Korsak sky's Prelude to " and "A Siegfried Prelude to "The N Nuremberg," by Wa

There have been programs and pe Serge Koussevitzky leagues. What mad remarkable was th style, the technical consistent clarity. piece was "color means that the first the various sections opportunity to displ And they did!

The horns, for exa pecially the incidenta Mr. Valkenier, were beauty. So were the Mr. Speyer again con perb English horn so movement of the Shost could go on down the as much for the other first-desk men.

One thoroughly fami Koussevitzky's condu naturally expect the of the program to be well done. But he surpri[illegible] at least one listener by the excellence of his Wagner. That composer Mr. Koussevitzky does not often put on Symphony programs, and one has felt that with certain exceptions, the conductor has not been so successful with Wagner as with other composers. But "The Mastersingers" Prelude had amazing breadth and clearness; the counterpoint was a web of balanced, independently sounding voices. There were no tonal thickness, no exaggeration, which was true as well of each item on the progoram.

When Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the Shostakovich Sixth to Boston last March, he paid it the significant compliment of repeating it a week later. This Symphony is indeed music of substance, a degree of originality, and of instrumental mastery.

To be sure, the march of the short finale gives a queer touch to the work as a whole. What begins in high seriousness ends in low comedy. No matter. It is all enjoyable.

EAST BAY LABOR
JOURNAL
OAKLAND, CAL
12/11/42

Boston Symphony Signs Trade Union Agreement

The Boston symphony, which for several years has been the only non-union orchestra of national prominence in the United States, has finally signed a contract with the American federation of musicians (AFL).

This Clipping From
FAYETTEVILLE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 1942

A VICTORY FOR MUSIC

(Christian Science Monitor)

Signing of a contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Federation of Musicians is a significant incident in the history of labor relations in the United States.

Its significance lies in these facts: it brings into the Federation the last remaining non-union symphony orchestra in the country; it assures the artistic integrity not only of the Boston orchestra but of all American symphony orchestras, and it is a conspicuous example of the possibilities of negotiation in handling labor controversies.

The Boston orchestra was founded and for many years sustained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who entrusted the artistic command to the conductor but kept in his own hands the reins of economic control. After he passed on the annual deficit was made up by Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who was as little disposed as had been his predecessor to deal with labor unions.

With the passing of Mr. Dane, the trustees were faced with a deficit for two seasons of $188,000, which must in the absence of another individual benefactor, be raised by subscription.

Meanwhile, pressure from the union had been steadily increasing. The orchestra had been barred from playing over the radio or for records. Most of the famous solo artists, as members of the union, were not allowed to appear with the Boston orchestra. There was some doubt whether the orchestra would even be allowed to use the halls it had engaged in other cities.

The actual existence of the orchestra was threatened. At this critical moment, Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, made it clear when the season opened this fall that the management was not opposed to unionization as such, provided the artistic standards of the orchestra could be assured. This meant that the conductor must be able to employ musicians wherever he was able to find them and must retain full disciplinary powers.

James C. Petrillo, president of the union, under severe pressure of public opinion because of his recent conduct of its affairs, on his part expressed a willingness to procure the necessary changes in the union by-laws, so far as they affected the major symphony orchestras, to meet these requirements. The members of the Boston orchestra then voted unanimously to join the union.

Thus there was achieved what Mr. Greene had said the management desired—a victory not for the orchestra, nor for the union, but for music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra a Necessity

To the Editor of The Herald:

Can it really happen here—that we may lose the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of lack of public support? How many people, I wonder, saw the British sailor at last Friday's concert, listening, with his head on his arms, transported by the Beethoven Concerto to a world of beauty? Haven't we all gone home from the concerts moved and resolved that such music represents the best effort of man? When the city of London was being destroyed, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played for us the London Symphony, and we knew then that London could never really be destroyed—the very issues of the war and the vision of peace were burnt as clear as fire on us who heard that concert.

This year we have heard the Shostakovitch Symphony, written during the attack on Moscow. And, as always, we have heard German music—Beethoven, Bach, Brahms, Haydn. No good music comes from Germany now, but some day again, perhaps, it will. In London during the worst days, Myra Hess gave music at noontime to the tired people of London, people who had to sleep underground like rats. These concerts at the National Gallery were packed. This music was a healing force, more than that, it kept tragedy and deadly discomfort from engulfing their lives, they were able to put first things first.

Can it mean that we who have just begun to be touched by the war are not recognizing what "first things" are? That we must not let Boston's greatest artistic achievement just slip through our fingers because we haven't the sense to see what we shall be missing?

It is not just a rich people's orchestra—it plays for all of us. We know it is the finest orchestra in the world now and that Dr. Koussevitzky is the greatest conductor. We must tell them this before it is too late.

INA R. WHITE.

Chestnut Hill.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
12/14/42

Word comes from Boston that, following its treaty of peace with James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has solved some of its financial problems by signing a recording contract with RCA Victor. This will also include the recording of performances by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

To Symphony Hall, last evening, returned George Szell to lead the Symphony Orchestra once more in the programme that he offered here at a recent pair of "regular" concerts: Schubert's Symphony in C major, the conductor's admirable orchestral transcription of Smetana's string quartet, "From My Life," and that composer's tone poem, "The Moldau." This programme will be heard for a fourth time this afternoon.

Once more Mr. Szell showed himself to be a conductor of authority and imagination and, withal, an admirable musician. Schubert's Symphony in his hands is pointed up, but this over-played, over-long work can stand such treatment. With the music of his countrymen, Smetana, Mr. Szell is on less debatable ground. No other conductor has yet attempted his version of the quartet, but it is hard to see how it could be surpassed, and "The Moldau" is certainly his dish. The orchestra played with the utmost brilliance throughout and the audience was appropriately enthusiastic.

DEC 12 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS JOINED UNION

Only Non-Union Great Orchestra in America Now in Radio Family

Boston Symphony, which has been non-union all its life under nine conductors, has now joined the union. Negotiations lasted six months. Boston held out for a concession allowing the orchestra to hire its players from any local union in the U.S. or Canada. The concession being granted automatically permits any symphony orchestra to engage players from anywhere in North America. European engagees are treated individually.

Twenty-five years ago Stokowski said in Toronto that he would know Boston Symphony blindfold by its tone. He spoke of the great orchestra endowed by the late Col. Higginson, but since his death a straight competitive concern, as though it were an institution as much in its own class as the Mendelssohn Choir was among choral societies. One distinction of the Boston Symphony was that in all the evolution of musical unionism in America to a point of almost absolute domination of orchestras by the W.P.A., the players conducted by Koussevitsky were the only regular-symphonic body of instrumental non-union musicians in America.

Since radio became such a big factor in orchestra revenues, the Boston Symphony found itself under a handicap by the 1940 edict of James Petrillo, head of the W.P.A., threatening to withdraw any union players from groups doing business with the Boston Symphony. As radio playing is vital to a great orchestra, this was probably the main reason why Boston joined the union.

Twenty years ago great orchestras played to only local audiences in their home cities and on tour. Now a great orchestra can be heard from its own hall all over America. Boston Orchestra was first on the air, back in 1926. Since 1937 it has been off the air. The first broadcast is Dec. 26 from 9.15 to 10.15 over Blue Network and 145 stations.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

George Szell was the guest conductor last evening for the fifth program of the "shorter" series of Boston Symphony concerts, offering exhilarating, imaginative interpretations of the same works which he conducted at the regular concerts of Jan. 29-30.

It is not a particularly adventuresome program, which includes Schubert's Symphony No. 7 in C major and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," although Mr. Szell departs from convention with his own extraordinarily sensitive and effective orchestral version of Smetana's String Quartet No. 1 in E minor, "From My Life." But it is a program musically perfect, emotionally fresh, springlike and richly rewarding. Both the audience and the men of the orchestra gave Mr. Szell an ovation at the close of the Schubert.

Mr. Szell has a flair for outlining the architecture of a piece by giving it rhymthmic impetus (which is never headlong) and by selecting tempi that are inevitably right. Last evening he received electric responses from the orchestra which played with clarity, precision and the famous Boston Symphony brilliance and depth of tone. The orchestral choirs were maintained in a wonderfully delicate balance.

There was much charm, expressiveness and beauty of detail in the Schubert. It was also exciting.

Smetana's Quartet, avowedly an experiment in dramatic program music of chamber proportions, is extremely difficult to play in its original version. It has always seemed, to most critics, to be too big for its boots. In Mr. Szell's orchestral version it becomes a large dramatic work of grip and force, as well as of quiet beauty. As with "The Moldau," which closed the program, Mr. Szell made it flow, whirl and sing on in a cloud of lovely sound.

The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.—J. W. R.

[28]

Globe
Nov 22

MUSIC

By ELINOR HUGHES

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 11th regular concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the program being as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov.....Introduction and Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"
Moussorgsky...Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Shostakovitch.....Symphony No. 8
Wagner....Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"
Wagner...Prelude to "[illegible]"

Mother Gives

[illegible] Several dozen more blockhouses were cleared inside northern Stalingrad and northwest of the Volga [illegible] 10 days of December.)

[illegible] tion of 743 Soviet tanks in the last [illegible] the capture of several places on the central front and the destruction of 343 Soviet tanks in the last [illegible] Lake Ilmen. The Germans claimed [illegible] Caucasus region, at Stalingrad, in the great Don bend and south of [illegible] tacks were repelled in the Terek-[illegible] (The Germans said Russian attempts to have another important command.

[illegible] but he was believed to have another military leader. The whereabouts of Timoshenko were not disclosed, [illegible] fenses. Second only to Stalin as [illegible] was appointed vice commissar of defensive in the Rzhev sector and when he commanded a central front was last heard from last summer critical southwest region. Zhukov Timoshenko as commander in the he had succeeded Marshal Zemeon people were surprised to hear that last winter, and now the Russian

It was Zhukov who saved Moscow

ZHUKOV SCORES AGAIN

Zhukov as the supreme hero.

The jubilant Russian press featured the victory pronouncement with solid spreads on their front pages and proclaimed Gen. Gregory rowest point.

mass was 37 miles wide at its nar- and Don. The surrounding Russian rowing corridor between the Volga ring of bayonets and guns in a narenemy divisions fenced in a steel left the remnants of 22 half-tarvec ing or capture of 312,550 axis troops which saved Stalingrad with the killiles northwest through Bataisk to Rostov.

The brilliant six weeks campaign [illegible] southeast of Nalchik in the centre Caucasus. Moreover, they would b astride a railway leading about 18

Post MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was altogether magnificent. If it set the standard for the New Year, we are fortunately in for memorable playing.

Mr. Koussevitzky had chosen a good program for a holiday, consisting mostly of short pieces. If there was nothing trivial, there was also nothing to which you had to listen very hard, apart from the first movement of Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony. All the rest was easy to absorb — the Introduction and Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantschina," and "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

There have been more exciting programs and performances by Serge Koussevitzky and his colleagues. What made yesterday so remarkable was the accuracy of style, the technical polish, and the consistent clarity. Every single piece was "color music," which means that the first desk men and the various sections had plenty of opportunity to display their skill. And they did!

The horns, for example, and especially the incidental solo work of Mr. Valkenier, were of incredible beauty. So were the other brasses. Mr. Speyer again contributed a superb English horn solo in the first movement of the Shostakovich. One could go on down the line and say as much for the other distiguished first-desk men.

One thoroughly familiar with Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting would naturally expect the Russian half of the program to be exceptionally well done. But he surprised at least one listener by the excellence of his Wagner. That composer Mr. Koussevitzky does not often put on Symphony programs, and one has felt that with certain exceptions, the conductor has not been so successful with Wagner as with other composers. But "The Mastersingers" Prelude had amazing breadth and clearness; the counterpoint was a web of balanced, independently sounding voices. There were no tonal thickness, no exaggeration, which was true as well of each item on the progoram.

When Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the Shostakovich Sixth to Boston last March, he paid it the significant compliment of repeating it a week later. This Symphony is indeed music of substance, a degree of originality, and of instrumental mastery.

To be sure, the march of the short finale gives a queer touch to the work as a whole. What begins in high seriousness ends in low comedy. No matter. It is all enjoyable.

Yesterday as last March, the Symphony was performed in the slightly revised version made by Shostakovich for publication of the score.

Next week the orchestra goes again to New York. The next Boston concerts, Jan. 15 and 16, will be conducted by Richard Burgin, whose progoram will be: Overture to "Donna Diana," Reznicek; "Don Quixote," by Strauss, with Jean Bedetti 'cello soloist; Fourth Piano Concerto, Saint-Saens, Robert Casadesus, soloist.—C. W. D.

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Give Concert at Carnegie

Telegram

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Our old friend, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, was back again in Carnegie Hall last night, with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony sounding the Victory Theme in gripping style.

With the new implications no doubt in mind, Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was freshened and tightened to stirring effect. Where dragging tempi marred earlier readings, last night's was keyed steadily to vivid drama and mounting impact.

The conductor seemed intent on breathing new life into the great score. Not that Beethoven's ringing manifesto needs it. But, after a while, readings tend to stale a bit. A conductor's outlook alters, and, Presto, the music yields fresh secrets.

* * *

More Humanized.

It seemed a new Beethoven Fifth for the Boston Symphony—more compact and humanized, delving deeper, and pulsing throughout with the tortured Titan's grapple with adverse Fate, ending in rousing victory.

Orchestral tone, even the Boston's, never sounded fresher. The wide range of anguished speech and shattering conflict was fully mirrored in the rendering. Detail was crisp and uncannily right. The finale transition never rang out better.

Purely as playing the whole program moved on the one supervivid plane. There were two other numbers listed, a Corelli Suite and Martinu's First Symphony. The Beethoven score merely outclassed them as music. In performance, neither conductor nor orchestra showed any partiality. All three numbers ran along parallel lines of virtuosity.

The Corelli Suite arrived in Ettore Pinelli's known arrangement of three pieces by the founding father of virtuoso fiddling. While the swift-paced Bad inerie section easily topped the Sarabande and Gigue, the whole version, in lush string scoring was cut trimly to Boston Symphony style.

* * *

Rarely Heard Now.

Apart from the few extant sonatas and concerti grossi, Corelli rarely haunts concert halls these days. The 17th century knew him as the "virtuoso of virtuosos and the Orpheus of our time."

There's no telling how Corelli as fiddler would measure up to a Heifetz or Kriseler. Technique has taken such giant strides since then. Corelli's style would need plenty of stepping up. Even Paganini would find today's grade hard going. A few of the old tricks may have been lost to the trade, though it's doubtful.

The Martinu symphony was premiered here by the Boston unit earlier this season. The four movements still added up to glowing results at a second hearing. Martinu can write. The mastery of medium is first-rate. His patterns are fluid and variedly hued. Harmonies, themes and rhythms fuse smoothly into single units of expression.

The symphony is tailor-made for Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. Few recent scores match it in rich scoring for strings. The sonorities are bland and silken. Super-finesse is at work in every phrase. The score may still come to be known as Martinu's "Boston" symphony.

Dowling Play Rehearsing

Billie Burke and Martha Scott will be co-starred by Eddie Dowling in This Rock, the Walter Livingston Scott comedy now in rehearsal under Mr. Dowling. The play opens in Hartford Jan. 30, moving to Boston for two weeks prior to its New York premiere.

FINE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Strauss' "Don Quixote" a Notable Feature

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony's 62d season reaches its halfway mark this week with a most attractive programme that fared exceedingly well in its initial presentation yesterday afternoon.

Following a reversed chronology, this list, conducted by Richard Burgin, includes three of Respighi's transcriptions of ancient airs and dances for the lute, Strauss' "Don Quixote," and the C minor Piano Concerto of Saint-Saens, with Robert Casadesus as the soloist.

In the tone poem of Strauss, Jean Bedetti assumed once more the role of solo 'cellist and chief protagonist, which he has thrice yielded to Gregor Piatigorsky, and, as in the last four performances at Symphony Hall, Jean LeFranc played the solo viola part, which gives voice and presence to the paunchy esquire, Sancho Panza.

Not before had Mr. Burgin conducted this highly exacting score and so eloquent have been the recent performances under Dr. Koussevitzky that one might have been a bit fearful of the result. Such fears, however, were groundless. The performance was a triumph for all concerned. One thing in particular commended this performance and that was its coherence and continuity, its freedom from the longueurs that may accompany a too finicky interpretation of the music.

It is the fashion now to say that "Don Quixote" is Strauss' finest orchestral work and there are good grounds for this opinion. Nowhere else is his fancy so exuberant his invention so distinguished, his technical skill so variously and strikingly exhibited. Nevertheless, we have here a supreme example of both the weakness and the strength of programme music. How can "Don Quixote" mean anything to those who do not recognize the dramatis personae, to those for whom the lovely Dulcinea theme is merely one more pretty tune, who do not, or cannot, follow the various adventures of Knight and 'Squire, as set forth in the programme notes, and try to hear it merely as music?

After such richly significant music as this the Concerto of Saint-Saens was bound to sound a bit empty and superficial. The French composer's star is somewhat in eclipse just now, but he was no mean craftsman and he could write themes that were more than a string of notes. Actually, the Concerto was good to hear, and its performance at the hands of soloist and orchestra was one of surpassing brilliance that drew cheers from the audience. To make belated mention of Respighi's Old Dances and Airs, these modern re-creations of a musically fragrant past have been long absent from the orchestra's repertory and Mr. Burgin did well to restore them to it.

REAL DELIGHT BY SYMPHONY

Jan. 1, 1943

Koussevitzky Gives Chief Role to Rimsky-Korsakov

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is evidently Dr. Koussevitzky's belief that Rimsky-Korsakov is an excellent "holiday" composer, and he is not so far off. The pictorial Russian was twice represented on last week's Boston Symphony programme and he has first place on that of yesterday afternoon and this evening.

From the last and most widely known of his 15 operas, "Le Coq d'Or," Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen for this New Year's list the Introduction and the Wedding March. The deft orchestral hand of Rimsky is also shown in the next number, the imaginative prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," an opera which would not exist had not his faithful friend completed and orchestrated it.

The portion of the concert to be broadcast this evening also includes the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us last March. This reviewer finds it a great deal easier to get excited about this symphony than about its over-publicized successor, the Brobdingnagian Seventh. For one thing, it can be heard without fatigue. There are but three movements, and only at times in the initial largo is there a hint of the diffuseness that makes the Seventh so tiresome.

While it lacks the emotional impact of the slow movement of the Fifth and has not quite the sensuous charm of the corresponding section of the First, this largo of the Sixth Symphony is both a deeply felt and a deeply moving piece of music. Here, as so often in the later Shostakovitch, comes a suggestion of both the means and matter of Gustav Mahler. Yet the story is told that when the reviewers began pointing out these Mahlerisms, the apparently astonished composer asked the Am-Russ Music Corporation in New York to send him all the Mahler scores, since he wished to become acquainted with them. If this was not pure camouflage, we must see in these resemblances to the Moravian composer a sort of artistic reincarnation.

The symphony was beautifully and brilliantly played, as was the entire programme, and it met with enthusiastic approval.

Richard Wagner, whom Shostakovitch does not consider an "important" composer, brought up the rear with two of his finest inspirations, "that miracle of rare device," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the ever-glorious prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to dawdle over the "Idyl" and to unduly inflate the prelude. He did neither yesterday. Both performances were a joy to hear. The audience liked the one and it greeted the other with cheers.

New Year With Koussevitzky

Christian Science Monitor—Jan. 2,

By L. A. Sloper

To introduce the New Year, Dr. Koussevitzky chose the following list for the eleventh program of the Boston Symphony season: the Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina;" Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" Prelude.

The Russian half of the program, as played yesterday afternoon, offered various pleasures. Rimsky's lively measures, full of good tunes and gay rhythms and bright colors, constituted the first and not the least of these. The brilliant performance set them forth in their most ingratiating aspect.

That greater member of the Russian "Five," Moussorgsky, was appropriately represented by the exquisite "Khovanstchina" Prelude, which was realized with a beauty of tone and a subtlety of inflection that even this conductor and this orchestra, it seemed yesterday, have seldom equalled.

Incidentally, both these items served also to remind us how much certain successors owed to their composers, who were the rebels of their time, and who were looked down upon by many of their contemporaries as amateurs because they did not follow the German tradition of Russian music. Yet but for them, two later rebels, Stravinsky and Debussy, could hardly have made their contributions to music. Today, listening to these two excerpts, you can see the features of their descendants being formed.

The position of Shostakovitch is less clear, and not because of any strangeness or obscurity in the Sixth Symphony, however it may seem to Mr. Stokowski as quoted in the program book. Indeed, it is the obviousness of the symphony that makes one feel that to precede it with the Rimsky and Moussorgsky numbers was no kindness to its composer.

For although the excerpts from the earlier composers are less extensive, they contain more of musical value; and although perhaps suspect because they were designed for use in the theater rather than the concert hall, they nevertheless possess the qualities necessary for a musical work of art. They have recognizable melodies, perceptible rhythmic patterns, and logical form. Incidentally, they have color and charm and conciseness.

Shostakovitch's truncated Sixth, on the other hand, is melodically banal, rhythmically spasmodic, and amorphous. Moreover, it is drab, dull, and discursive. Mr. Burk reports in the program book that Dr. Koussevitzky is using in the current performances a score embodying numerous alterations of detail by the composer. I am afraid that more radical changes are needed.

The piece has some pleasant moments, but its composer has been wanting in self-criticism. He seems unable to distinguish between a theme of flowing line or pregnant character and a mere succession of notes. His use of rhythmic figures that are now commonplace cannot conceal this thematic poverty, nor can his dissonances make us forget the shapelessness of the entire work.

It would appear that Shostakovitch has more erudition than imagination. He employs the machinery of his great predecessors, but his results are less impressive than theirs. And when he changes the rules by writing a symphony that begins with a Largo which constitutes half the entire work, he is merely distorting a classic form without convincing us that the distortion brings something of originality and value into musical history.

Finally, Shostakovitch really should not try to be witty, as the resemblance of his last movement to that of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony suggests he is doing. It is just not his métier.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 2- 1943

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday night and on Saturday afternoon.

This Clipping From BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3- 1943

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening.

[29]

Boston Post — JAN. 3, 1943

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO REMAIN HERE IN BOSTON

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE silly yet widely circulated rumor that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was going to forsake Boston for New York next fall has been effectively quashed by the announcement made early last week that Artur Rodzinski had been engaged as regular conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony for the season of 1943-4. Bruno Walter will be guest conductor for not less than six weeks; and Howard Barlow, ablest of American-born conductors, who made his first appearances with the New York orchestra this season, has been re-engaged, probably for another fortnight.

To those "in the know" the Koussevitzky story made very little sense, but the spiking of it is one more proof that you shouldn't believe all you hear. And that is something we cannot be told too often nowadays. The Boston season with its many out-of-town concerts is strenuous enough, goodness knows, but the Philharmonic makes up for this with a longer home season, 30 weeks, with three concerts a week, which nearly always means three more or less distinct programmes. In view of Dr. Koussevitzky's present tendency to contract rather than expand his active repertory and his desire for ample and thorough rehearsing of even the most familiar music, that is where the Manhattan shoe would pinch. Besides, the doctor is probably quite content to remain in charge of an orchestra to which he can point with justifiable pride as the greatest in the world. His retirement might cause surprise; his going to another city would inspire amazement. Incidentally, two important posts are now theoretically open, Chicago and Cleveland. What these two lake cities will do about it is a problem that will interest many.

Dalmatian-born, Polish-blooded Rodzinski has been in Cleveland since 1933, though this is already his third season as guest conductor of the band that is now to be rightfully his.. Yesterday he reached his 49th birthday and that, for a conductor, as for a general, is the prime of life. He has a yen for opera as well, and in Cleveland he has put on performances of Strauss and Wagner operas, and of Shostakovitch's "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." This he took to New York, where its scandalous and sensational qualities made quite a stir. He might be said to specialize in both Strauss and Shostakovitch. He made the news by commissioning Jerome Kern to concoct for him a symphonic synthesis of "Show Boat." He and his orchestra have made many recordings and he has often been heard over the air from both Cleveland and New York.

On Feb. 13, 1938, the Cleveland Orchestra came to Symphony Hall, where it was greeted by a disgracefully small but compensatingly enthusiastic audience. The programme included the Shostakovitch First, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and both "The Dance of the Seven Veils" and the final scene from his "Salome," with Rosa Pauly as the singer. The Post concluded its generally laudatory review by saying: "The feeling of complete satisfaction with our own possessions which a concert by a visiting orchestra is so likely to engender in the Bostonian breast was not quite so much in evidence last evening. There are some things in the world which we did not know about."

One of these things was the second "Salome" excerpt. That blazing, transfiguring page has not been vouchsafed us again, and as for the opera as opera, the pathological daughter of Herodias is still persona non grata in this stronghold of Puritanism and is likely to remain so for some time.

* * * *

Mention of "Salome" brings to mind another conductor, the Czech George Szell, soon to be a guest at Symphony Hall, whose reading of that extraordinary score has set the New York reviewers by the ears. He has also done "Tannhaeuser" and "Boris Godunov," and the revival of "Pelleas and Melisande" will be entrusted to him. It seems as though Boston might get at least one of them, preferably not "Tannhaeuser," which we have had quite often of late.

Now that "Salome's" standing as a masterpiece of the lyric theatre is unquestioned, it is interesting to reflect on the limited production of such commodities in the present century, as compared with the preceding 42 years. That just lets in "Tristan," "Faust" and "Un Ballo in Maschera" (which is not quite in their class), and you can figure out the others for yourself. Deprived of these works an opera company, for instance the Metropolitan, that subsists mainly on the standard repertory, would soon go out of business.

The current engagement of the Salmaggi Company at the Casino Theatre, which ends this evening with an interesting quasi-novelty, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," was also notable for the performance of his "Otello," noblest of Italian operas. Introduced to Boston by the San Carlo Company in 1921, "The Force of Destiny" has not yet been heard here by a major company. Note: the Met has announced its revival this season. A "transition" opera, on the long climb to the heights of "Otello" and "Falstaff," it suggests both the middle and the later Verdi, has some of his most effective music. The singers this evening will be Mmes. Nelli and Paula; Messrs. Ferrara, Vale, Ruisi and Nari. Mr. Simeoni will conduct. This afternoon brings a repeat performance of "Lucia di Lammermoor."

* * * *

Marian Anderson, notable contralto, will sing at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

THE SAT. EVENING POST
PHILA., PA.
1/9/43

A Happy Situation

IT'S old stuff by this time, but we are still fascinated by James Caesar Petrillo's magnanimity in dealing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, in the protective custody of the American Federation of Musicians, is now off Mr. Petrillo's black list. As Caesar explained when the articles of capitulation were signed, the agreement "will permit the Boston Symphony to make records—when the record dispute is over—go on the radio and do the things that other orchestras are able to do that are members of the federation." Mr. Petrillo then added: "A very happy situation, a great orchestra, a great conductor."

As the cat might have remarked, with the canary inside her, "Peace, it's wonderful!" What Bach, Beethoven or the American music lover thinks of the fact that a great orchestra with a great conductor must get right with Petrillo before it can be heard outside its own concert hall is for the sounder-outers of public opinion to discover.

JAN. 8, 1943

Koussevitzky Plays Martinu 1st Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its second visit this season to the metropolis and featured in the program presented in Carnegie Hall the First Symphony of the Czechoslovakian composer Bohuslav Martinu. The work was completed last Summer. According to the composer's account of the task of creating such a score, "the large proportions, the expansive form of the symphony necessarily force the composer to put himself on a high plane. It is possible that my thoughts dwell upon objects or events of an almost everyday simplicity familiar to everyone."

These ideas he set forth with strange concoctions of sound, the entire gamut of rhythms and tempos, terrific dynamics and climaxes, as his suggestions of "everyday simplicity." In qualifying what is "familiar to everyone," the score was sprinkled with themes from Wagner, Puccini and other well known composers.

The interpretation of so complex a score was an arduous task, but out of the musical melange emerged a performance that did credit to the members of the orchestra and to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for their valiant endeavor.

* * *

The season's repetition of "Tannhaeuser" at the Metropolitan last evening contained important changes from the preceding presentation.

Astrid Varney was heard as Elisabeth and gave a gratifying portrayal.

Rene Maison was billed to sing the title role, but illness again claimed him and Arthur Carron substituted. He offered a dramatic and sincere performance.

Karin Branzell sang Venus acceptably; Alexander Kipnis gave a thoughtfully conceived and effectively delivered portrayal of the Landgrave.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini is preparing another all-American program to be performed Feb. 7 by the NBC Orchestra. A feature of the list will be Grofe's "Grand Canyon" Suite. The concert will terminate Toscanini's current engagement of eight weeks, but he will return for two weeks in April.

This Clipping From WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
JAN 6 1943

Editorial Page Comments

UNIONIZED SYMPHONY

Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable. The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestras appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

MARTINU NOVELTY PERFORMED AGAIN

New York Times
JAN 8, 1943

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Second thoughts on Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 1 do not contradict the first. Repeated in Carnegie Hall last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, this ingeniously wrought example of contemporary craftsmanship prompted precisely the same mixed feelings of pleasure and regret that were noted when the new work was introduced here by Dr. Koussevitzky on a Saturday afternoon in November. It was a pleasure to follow the course of writing as skilled, refined and free of bluster and strain as that which made up the four movements of this symphony. As was stated in an earlier review, the regrets spring from the music's low profile, its lack of really significant substance.

There is a kind of breadth and fullness in the harmonization and the instrumentation that runs contrary to the score's want of melodic peaks and climactic moments. A characteristic tonal quality is evoked that is at once personal and attractive. But it pervades everything, from first to last, and takes on an inevitable sameness. Curiously, there are almost no solo leadings that are rememberable as such; instead, there is a continual interweaving and choiring of voices in a faintly dissonant sweetness that seems always about to lead into some bit of ensemble singing more frank and sturdy than is ever achieved.

A piano contributes some interesting figurations, particularly in the scherzolike second movement, but it remains but one of the band. Harp passages are similarly arresting and incidental. One waits vainly for the fructifying of ideas that assert an appreciable measure of charm, but seem incapable of growth. Here is a work wholly free of the noisy, the theatrical and the vulgar. It is technically secure and it has an individual savor. But it has no power to soar. Mr. Martinu, Czech-born, but now composing and teaching in this country, was again present to bow his acknowledgment of the favorable reception accorded his composition.

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted polished and characteristic performances of a suite by Corelli and the Beethoven C minor Symphony. The Corelli music was heard in an arrangement for string orchestra by Ettore Pinelli. It consisted of Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, as adapted from the old Italian's violin sonatas—an engaging but scarcely a momentous resuscitation.

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

WORK BY MARTINU IS REPEATED HERE

New York Times
Jan 9, 1943

Koussevitzky Leads the Boston Orchestra in Composer's First at Carnegie Hall

BEAUTY SEEN IN RENDITION

Repetition Gives Opportunity to Estimate Full Value of the Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

In a week which has seen some remarkable orchestral performance in this city nothing has fallen upon the ear with such an effect of sheer transporting beauty as the tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Dr. Koussevitzky directed last night in Carnegie Hall. In the eighteen years of his conductorship of this organization he has brought it to a condition of unparalleled perfection, and in this circumstance alone would have an advantage over other conductors, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra could make a C major triad sound as glorious as a rainbow.

The program gave certain special opportunities for the display of these tonal qualities—among other superlative characteristics of the band. One of these special opportunities was provided by the repetition of Jaraslav Martinu's First symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky had made known at a New York concert of the Boston Symphony earlier in the season. It was a good plan to repeat this symphony, which has immediately won public approval, because, as is the case with all worth-while music, it is only repetition which allows us to estimate its full value.

Much to Appraise

And in this interesting score there is much to examine and appraise. It is in the first place exceptional, beautiful sound, and it has a refreshing folk-quality of the melodic ideas which is given added distinction by the individuality of the composer's workmanship. It is fundamentally, but not provincially, not parochially, a Czech symphony. This too is striking, if the observation is correct: namely, that since his arrival in America some two years ago Mr. Martinu seemed to have become more essentially, spiritually national in his art than he was in preceding years when he was under modern French influence. It is as though he had found confirmations of his ancestral birthright here, and one would like to believe that this is so. Such, at least, is the impression communicated by his symphony.

It is the work, obviously, of an exceptionally sincere and sensitive, self-critical artist. Mr. Martinu has approached the grand symphonic form with many searchings of his soul. He has questioned the attitude that the spirit in which a modern composer should approach this classic form. He is wary of falsely assuming the cloak of the grand manner, of substituting noise for eloquence, or confusing size with significance. Seeking the truthful and poetical expression of his ideas, he seeks an earnest truthfulness of style and proportion.

Special Style Achieved

We think he has succeeded in a large measure in his quest. He has achieved a special style in this symphony, perhaps too uniform a harmonic and orchestral style, for his ravishing color scheme becomes a little the same as the four movements proceed, and orchestral devices which admirably point up his tone-tints tend to become repetitious. But we find a degree of weakness in the symphonic structure. Charming ideas appear, and in considerable profusion. They are more often manipulated in limited ways than developed in the terminal symphonic manner.

The work seems, therefore, rather long for its material, beautiful as the sound is, indeed captivating to the ear as such, and haunting as are many of the moments of this shimmering, singing, tonal fabric.

The symphony was preceded by a delightful suite of several pieces by Arcangelo Corelli—a Saraband, Gigue and Badinerie arranged for string orchestra from one of the many "sonatas" by Ettore Pinelli; and the playing of the strings was sheer voluptuousness to the ear.

The concert ended with the incomparable Symphony which needs no introduction to audiences or readers, and better played than described. Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. So doing, he uttered more than columns of commentary.

[30]

Boston Post — Jan. 3, 1943

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO REMAIN HERE IN BOSTON

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE silly yet widely circulated rumor that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was going to forsake Boston for New York next fall has been effectively quashed by the announcement made early last week that Artur Rodzinski had been engaged as regular conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony for the season of 1943-4. Bruno Walter will be guest conductor for not less than six weeks; and Howard Barlow, ablest of American-born conductors, who made his first appearances with the New York orchestra this season, has been re-engaged, probably for another fortnight.

To those "in the know" the Koussevitzky story made very little sense, but the spiking of it is one more proof that you shouldn't believe all you hear. And that is something we cannot be told too often nowadays. The Boston season with its many out-of-town concerts is strenuous enough, goodness knows, but the Philharmonic makes up for this with a longer home season, 30 weeks, with three concerts a week, which nearly always means three more or less distinct programmes. In view of Dr. Koussevitzky's present tendency to contract rather than expand his active repertory and his desire for ample and thorough rehearsing of even the most familiar music, that is where the Manhattan shoe would pinch. Besides, the doctor is probably quite content to remain in charge of an orchestra to which he can point with justifiable pride as the greatest in the world. His retirement might cause surprise; his going to another city would inspire amazement. Incidentally, two important posts are now theoretically open, Chicago and Cleveland. What these two lake cities will do about it is a problem that will interest many.

Dalmatian-born, Polish-blooded Rodzinski has been in Cleveland since 1933, though this is already his third season as guest conductor of the band that is now to be rightfully his. Yesterday he reached his 49th birthday and that, for a conductor, as for a general, is the prime of life. He has a yen for opera as well, and in Cleveland he has put on performances of Strauss and Wagner operas, and of Shostakovitch's "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." This he took to New York, where its scandalous and sensational qualities made quite a stir. He might be said to specialize in both Strauss and Shostakovitch. He made the news by commissioning Jerome Kern to concoct for him a symphonic synthesis of "Show Boat." He and his orchestra have made many recordings and he has often been heard over the air from both Cleveland and New York.

On Feb. 18, 1938, the Cleveland Orchestra came to Symphony Hall, where it was greeted by a disgracefully small but compensatingly enthusiastic audience. The programme included the Shostakovitch First, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and both "The Dance of the Seven Veils" and the final scene from his "Salome," with Rosa Pauly as the singer. The Post concluded its generally laudatory review by saying: "The feeling of complete satisfaction with our own possessions which a concert by a visiting orchestra is so likely to engender in the Bostonian breast was not quite so much in evidence last evening. There are some things in the world which we did not know about."

One of these things was the second "Salome" excerpt. That blazing, transfiguring page has not been vouchsafed us again, and as for the opera as opera, the pathological daughter of Herodias is still persona non grata in this stronghold of Puritanism and is likely to remain so for some time.

* * * *

Mention of "Salome" brings to mind another conductor, the Czech George Szell, soon to be a guest at Symphony Hall, whose reading of that extraordinary score has set the New York reviewers by the ears. He has also done "Tannhaeuser" and "Boris Godunov," and the revival of "Pelleas and Melisande" will be entrusted to him. It seems as though Boston might get at least one of them, preferably not "Tannhaeuser," which we have had quite often of late.

Now that "Salome's" standing as a masterpiece of the lyric theatre is unquestioned, it is interesting to reflect on the limited production of such commodities in the present century, as compared with the preceding 42 years. That just lets in "Tristan," "Faust" and "Un Ballo in Maschera" (which is not quite in their class), and you can figure out the others for yourself. Deprived of these works an opera company, for instance the Metropolitan, that subsists mainly on the standard repertory, would soon go out of business.

The current engagement of the Salmaggi Company at the Casino Theatre, which ends this evening with an interesting quasi-novelty, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," was also notable for the performance of his "Otello," noblest of Italian operas. Introduced to Boston by the San Carlo Company in 1921, "The Force of Destiny" has not yet been heard here by a major company. Note: the Met has announced its revival this season. A "transition" opera, on the long climb to the heights of "Otello" and "Falstaff," it suggests both the middle and the later Verdi, has some of his most effective music. The singers this evening will be Mmes. Nelli and Paula; Messrs. Ferrara, Vale, Ruisi and Nari. Mr. Simeoni will conduct. This afternoon brings a repeat performance of "Lucia di Lammermoor."

* * * *

Marian Anderson, notable contralto, will sing at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

THE SAT. EVENING POST
PHILA., PA.
1/9/43

A Happy Situation

IT'S old stuff by this time, but we are still fascinated by James Caesar Petrillo's magnanimity in dealing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, in the protective custody of the American Federation of Musicians, is now off Mr. Petrillo's black list. As Caesar explained when the articles of capitulation were signed, the agreement "will permit the Boston Symphony to make records—when the record dispute is over—go on the radio and do the things that other orchestras are able to do that are members of the federation." Mr. Petrillo then added: "A very happy situation, a great orchestra, a great conductor."

As the cat might have remarked, with the canary inside her, "Peace, it's wonderful!" What Bach, Beethoven or the American music lover thinks of the fact that a great orchestra with a great conductor must get right with Petrillo before it can be heard outside its own concert hall is for the sounder outers of public opinion to discover.

Jan. 8, 1943

Koussevitzky Plays Martinu 1st Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening made its second visit this season to the metropolis and featured in the program presented in Carnegie Hall the First Symphony of the Czechoslovakian composer Bohuslav Martinu. The work was completed last Summer. According to the composer's account of the task of creating such a score, "the large proportions, the expansive form of the symphony necessarily force the composer to put himself on a high plane. It is possible that my thoughts dwell upon objects or events of an almost everyday simplicity familiar to everyone."

These ideas he set forth with strange connections of sound, the entire gamut of rhythms and tempos, terrific dynamics and climaxes, as his suggestions of "everyday simplicity." In qualifying what is "familiar to everyone," the score was sprinkled with themes from Wagner, Puccini and other well known composers.

The interpretation of so complex a score was an arduous task, but out of the musical melange emerged a performance that did credit to the members of the orchestra and to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for their valiant endeavor.

* * *

The season's repetition of "Tannhaeuser" at the Metropolitan last evening contained important changes from the preceding presentation.

Astrid Varnay was heard as Elisabeth and gave a gratifying portrayal.

Rene Maison was billed to sing the title role, but illness again claimed him and Arthur Carron substituted. He offered a dramatic and sincere performance.

Karin Branzell sang Venus acceptably; Alexander Kipnis gave a thoughtfully conceived and effectively delivered portrayal of the Landgrave.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini is preparing another all-American program, to be performed Feb. 7 by the NBC Orchestra. A feature of the list will be Grofe's "Grand Canyon" Suite. The concert will terminate Toscanini's current engagement of eight weeks, but he will return for two weeks in April.

This Clipping From WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
JAN 6 1943

Editorial Page Comments

UNIONIZED SYMPHONY
Boston Herald

The contract under which Conductor Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra have joined the Boston local of the American Federation of Musicians is a victory not only for James Caesar Petrillo, the so-called Czar of Music, but a substantial triumph for the orchestra itself. The negotiations which covered several months resulted in mutual concessions.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., stood firmly for their right to engage musicians wherever they might be found, whether in Boston or any other American or Canadian local or abroad. The standards which have given our great orchestra its world fame will not, therefore, be lowered. Mr. Petrillo was able to modify the by-laws of his Federation so that the trustees were not limited to the Boston area. Thus an important precedent has been established and the trustees have rendered a fine service for every other symphony group in the country, practically all of which are affiliated with the Federation.

Many outstanding Bostonians, to whom unionism may be repugnant, have felt for a long time that unionization in this instance was inevitable. The non-unionized Boston Symphony Orchestra has done no broadcasting and made no records for two years, and the revenue thereby cut off has been large. Petrillo enforced his ban by threats or strikes of his federated musicians against broadcasting stations or recording companies which used Boston Symphony music. He blacklisted halls where non-union orchestras appeared. He forbade instrumental soloists to participate in concerts of non-union organizations. At times he prevented the Symphony from utilizing famous guest conductors.

The 105 expert musicians of our orchestra voted by a very large majority to accept the judgment of the trustees as to unionization. The orchestra members are now, it is understood, 100 per cent favorable to the compromise which has been reached. They, individually, and the orchestra itself will be financial beneficiaries of the settlement, and there is reason to believe that the quality of the concerts will not be affected any more than in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Rochester and other places, where unionization was accomplished some time ago.

MARTINU NOVELTY PERFORMED AGAIN

New York Times
Jan 9, 1943

By OSCAR THOMPSON

Second thoughts on Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 1 do not contradict the first. Repeated in Carnegie Hall last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, this ingeniously wrought example of contemporary craftsmanship prompted precisely the same mixed feelings of pleasure and regret that were noted when the new work was introduced here by Dr. Koussevitzky on a Saturday afternoon in November. It was a pleasure to follow the course of writing as skilled, refined and free of bluster and strain as that which made up the four movements of this symphony. As was stated in an earlier review, the regrets spring from the music's low profile, its lack of really significant substance.

There is a kind of breadth and fullness in the harmonization and the instrumentation that runs contrary to the score's want of melodic peaks and climactic moments. A characteristic tonal quality is evoked that is at once personal and attractive. But it pervades everything, from first to last, and takes on an inevitable sameness. Curiously, there are almost no solo leadings that are rememberable as such; instead, there is a continual interweaving and choiring of voices in a faintly dissonant sweetness that seems always about to lead into some bit of ensemble singing more frank and sturdy than is ever achieved.

A piano contributes some interesting figurations, particularly in the scherzolike second movement, but it remains but one of the band. Harp passages are similarly arresting and incidental. One waits vainly for the fructifying of ideas that assert an appreciable measure of charm, but seem incapable of grow is a work wholly fre noisy, the theatrical an gar. It is technically s it has an individual sav
t has no power to soar.
inu, Czech-born, but n posing and teaching in th try, was again present to acknowledgment of the fa reception accorded his c
tion.

Mr. Koussevitzky also co ed polished and charact performances of a suite b relli and the Beethoven C Symphony. The Corelli was heard in an arrangeme string orchestra by Ettore P
It consisted of Sarabande, and Badinerie, as adapted the old Italian's violin sona an engaging but scarcely mentous resuscitation.

(From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.)

WORK BY MARTINU IS REPEATED HERE

New York Times
Jan 9, 1943

Koussevitzky Leads the Boston Orchestra in Composer's First at Carnegie Hall

BEAUTY SEEN IN RENDITION

Repetition Gives Opportunity to Estimate Full Value of the Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

In a week which has seen some remarkable orchestral performance in this city nothing has fallen upon the ear with such an effect of sheer transporting beauty as the tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Dr. Koussevitzky directed last night in Carnegie Hall. In the eighteen years of his conductorship of this organization he has brought it to a condition of unparalleled perfection, and in this circumstance alone would have an advantage over other conductors, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra could make a C major triad sound as glorious as a rainbow.

The program gave certain special opportunities for the display of these tonal qualities—among other superlative characteristics of the band. One of these special opportunities was provided by the repetition of Jaroslav Martinu's First Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky had made known at a New York concert of the Boston Symphony earlier in the season. It was a good plan to repeat this symphony, which has immediately won public approval, because, as is the case with all worth-while music, it is only repetition which allows us to estimate its full value.

Much to Appraise

And in this interesting score there is much to examine and appraise. It is in the first place exceptional, beautiful sound, and it has a refreshing folk-quality of the melodic ideas which is given added distinction by the individuality of the composer's workmanship. It is fundamentally, but not provincially, not parochially, a Czech symphony. This too is striking, if the observation is correct: namely, that since his arrival in America some two years ago Mr. Martinu seemed to have become more essentially, spiritually national in his art than he was in preceding years when he was under modern French influence. It is as though he had found confirmations of his ancestral birthright here, and one would like to believe that this is so. Such, at least, is the impression communicated by his symphony.

It is the work, obviously, of an exceptionally sincere and sensitive, self-critical artist. Mr. Martinu has approached the grand symphonic form with many searchings of his soul. He has questioned the attitude that the spirit in which a modern composer should approach this classic form. He is wary of falsely assuming the cloak of the grand manner, of substituting noise for eloquence, or confusing size with significance. Seeking the truthful and poetical expression of his ideas, he seeks an earnest truthfulness of style and proportion.

Special Style Achieved

We think he has succeeded in a large measure in his quest. He has achieved a special style in this symphony, perhaps too uniform a harmonic and orchestral style, for his ravishing color scheme becomes a little the same as the four movements proceed, and orchestral devices which admirably point up his tone-tints tend to become repetitious. But we find a degree of weakness in the symphonic structure. Charming ideas appear, and in considerable profusion. They are more often manipulated in limited ways than developed in the germinal symphonic manner.

The work seems, therefore, rather long for its material, beautiful as the sound is, indeed captivating to the ear as such, and haunting as are many of the moments of this shimmering, singing, tonal fabric.

The symphony was preceded by a delightful suite of several pieces by Arcangelo Corelli—a Saraband, Gigue and Badinerie arranged for string orchestra from one of the many "sonatas" by Ettore Pinelli; and the playing of the strings was sheer voluptuousness to the ear.

The concert ended with the incomparable Symphony which needs no introduction to audiences or readers, and better played than described. Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. So doing, he uttered more than columns of commentary.

[30]

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
BEE

JAN 9 - 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY—ON THE AIR

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky taps his baton, and his famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is off for one of its hour long radio programs, heard on KFBK Saturdays at 5:15 P. M. Organized in 1881, the Boston Symphony for the past eighteen years has been under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is shown in the lower picture.

Koussevitzky Conducts Three Russian Works

Herald-Tribune

Leads Boston Orchestra in Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Tchaikovsky Symphonies

Jan. 10, 1943

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Second matinee concert of its Carnegie Hall series, yesterday afternoon, with the following program:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25..Prokofieff
Symphony No. 6.....Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, Tchaikovsky

It would be difficult to try to picture to oneself a better example of collaborative virtuosity than yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Each of these three Russian pieces received the utmost in fine playing under Dr. Koussevitzky's benevolent vigilance. The orchestral sound at any given moment had the rare breathing quality that makes music come alive; the orchestra functioned like a completely integrated human personality. Delicacy did not preclude aggressiveness, nor firmness conflict with tenderness.

It was illuminating to see the Shostakovitch Sixth in close contact with its musical forebears. The emotional atmosphere of its first movement comes in good part out of Tchaikovsky, but there is in the writing neither the clarity nor the charm of that composer.

Parts of the second and third movements seem heavily influenced by Prokofieff, the Classical Symphony in particular; but whereas, the latter tightly knit little piece leads a life of its own, motivated wholly by its delicate harmonic impetus and phrasal badinage, the Shostakovitch work is insensitive, heavy - handed clowning.

The two brash and brilliant last movements do not balance the endless first; they are simply another piece. The unusual orchestral effects are not so unusual that they justify a work's being written around them. The whole symphony is nervous without being taut; it is not relaxed enough in spirit to warrant being so loosely constructed. It has the esthetic of the billboard rather than of the canvas. The perfect performance it received yesterday merely made clearer the essential superficiality of its conception. One was saddened to see such pains expended on a callous work incapable, as it were, of appreciating them.

The unfolding of the Tchaikovsky Fourth was magnificent. In the second movement the tempo was kept up to allay the latent saccharine tendencies. The dramatic contour of the pizzicato passages in the third movement was admirable; the distinct dynamic levels established for notes holding the same position in rhythmical figures were rigorously observed. Other examples of beautiful playing were the opening brass fanfare in the first movement of the same work, and the perfect trills of the violin line in the larghetto of the Classical Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

JAN. 10, 1943 Times

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

This Clipping From SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL
JAN 10 1943

Boston Symphony Is on

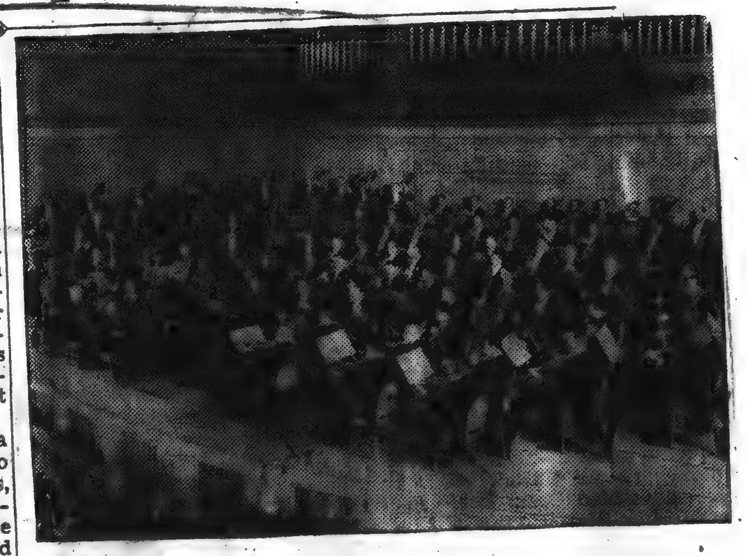
Finest Organization of Its Kind Now Heard Over KSCJ

LOVERS of classical music the nation over have welcomed the news that the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Kousevitsky, is back on the airlanes. Broadcast on Saturdays from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. over KSCJ and 145 other Blue network stations, the music of this superb orchestral group is available to radio listeners from coast to coast.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was the first major orchestra to give regular broadcast concerts, being first heard by the mass audience in 1926. It continued on the air until 1937, then discontinued its radio activity until its recent signing, for a long term, by the Blue network.

Organized in 1881, the Boston symphony has been under the direction of Dr. Kousevitsky for 18 years. His genius in transplanting his own intensity and fire to a superb group of musicians has resulted in the Boston symphony being labled the finest in the world.

James G. McDonald, Blue network news analyst, will act as commentator for the famous group.



BOSTON SYMPHONY—Acclaimed as the finest musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by the noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky (left), is heard over KSCJ every Saturday evening at 7:15. Organized in 1881, the Boston Symphony has been under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky for the last 18 years.

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 18 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex.

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD

JAN 18 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
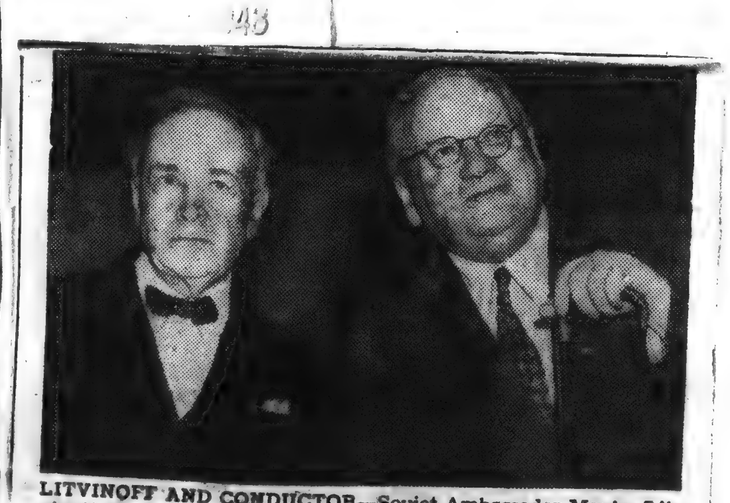
EVENING JOURNAL

'43



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
ITEM

JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~
Independent

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW

JAN 1 [illegible]

This Clipping From MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 15 1943

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HENDERSON, N. C.
DISPATCH

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From CUMBERLAND, MD.
NEWS

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
MAHONOY CITY, PA.
RECORD-AMERICAN

JAN 18 1943

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD

JAN 1 [illegible]

This Clipping From
BECKLEY, W. VA.
POST HERALD

JAN 18 1943

This Clipping From WESTCHESTER, PA.
LOCAL NEWS

JAN 18 1943

This Clipping From
ORANGEBURG, S. C.
TIMES & DEMOCRAT

JAN 19 1943

This Clipping From
GRAFTON, W. VA.
SENTINEL

JAN 19 1943

Debuts as Speaker

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

[32]

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
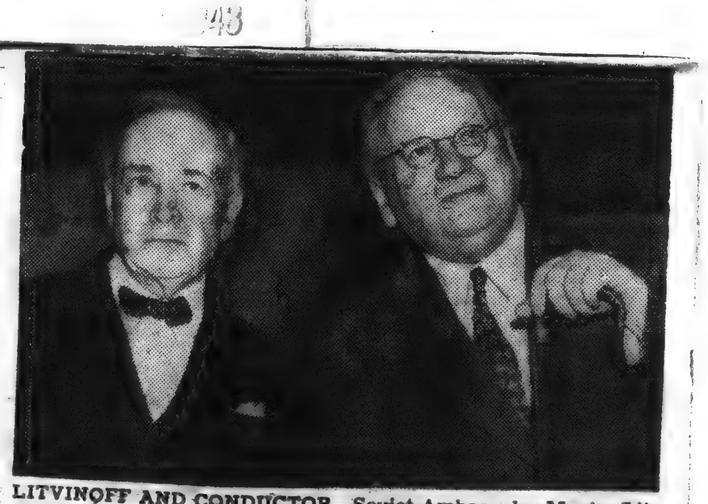
EVENING JOURNAL

43



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD

JAN 13 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JAN 16 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
ITEM

JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~
Independent

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW

JAN

This Clipping From MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JAN 15 1943

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HENDERSON, N. C.
DISPATCH

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From CUMBERLAND, MD.
NEWS

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
MAHONOY CITY, PA.
RECORD-AMERICAN

JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD

JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
BECKLEY, W. VA.
POST HERALD

JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From WESTCHESTER, PA.
LOCAL NEWS

JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
ORANGEBURG, S. C.
TIMES & DEMOCRAT

JAN 13 1943

[illegible] as Spea[illegible]

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

Daniel Boone was burie
Missouri in 1820; in 1845 h
mains, with those of his

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho
descending hurriedly from
It rolls itself into a ball
drops, depending on its t
elastic scales to break the f

* * *

Uruzga was governor
Louisiana during the early
of the American Revol
against England, and thi
this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americ
onies.

* * *

[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe JAN. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
EVENING JOURNAL

1943

LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 16, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD

JAN 13 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JAN 16 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
ITEM

JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~
Independent

JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW

JAN

This Clipping From MERIDEN, CONN.
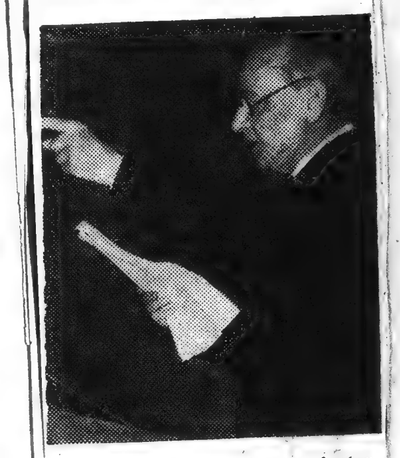
RECORD

JAN 15 1943

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HENDERSON, N. C.

Debuts as Speaker



Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

(Central Press)

---

[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: ". . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—". . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 16, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

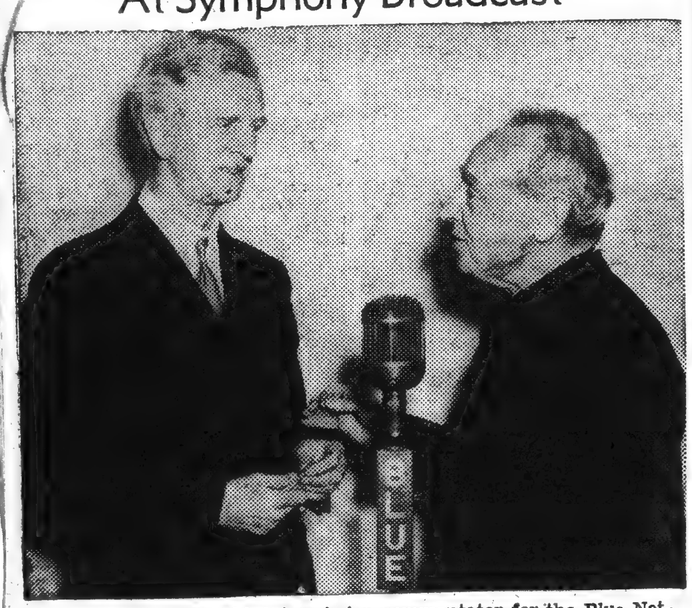
Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 13 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast



James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
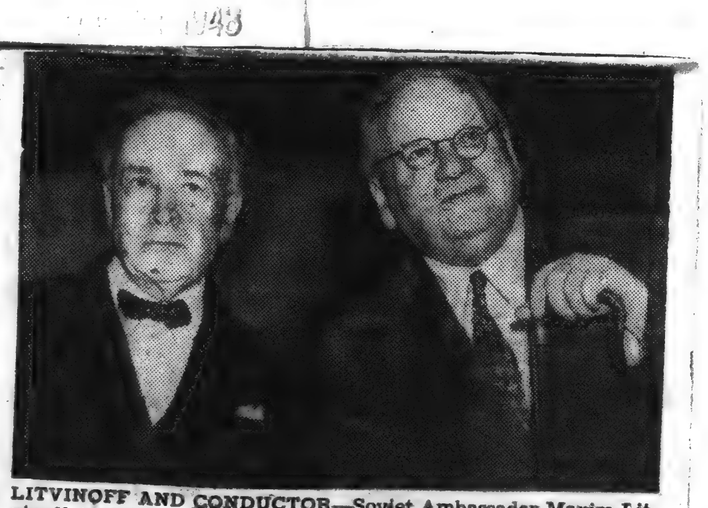
EVENING JOURNAL
1943



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

[32]

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
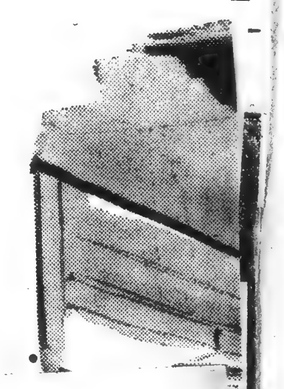
ITEM
JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~
Independent
JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW



Debuts as Speaker

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex.

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
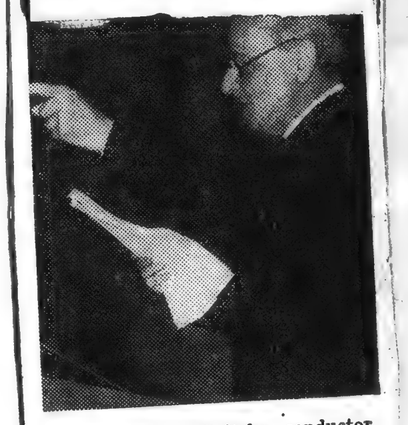
ITEM
JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~



Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
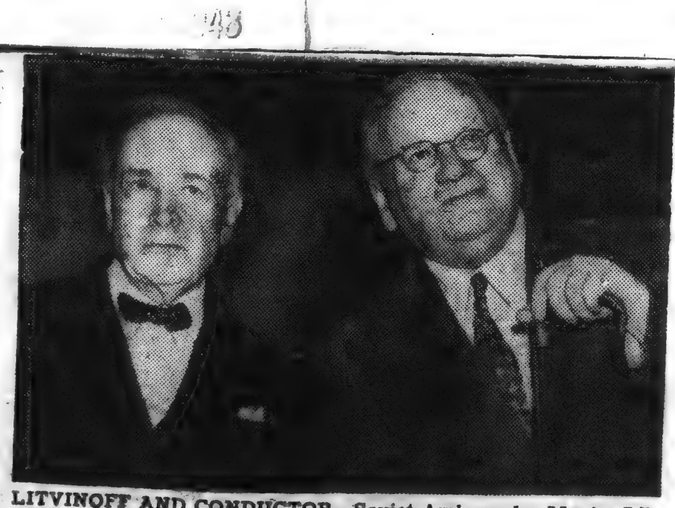
EVENING JOURNAL
1943



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

---

[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe — Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious musiç, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: ". . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—". . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 18 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 16 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
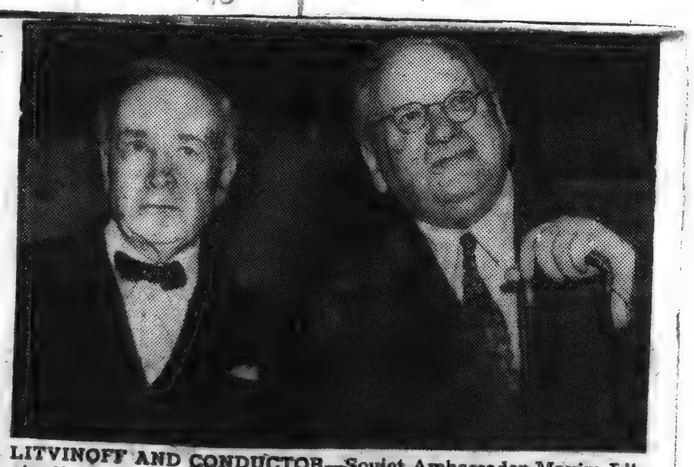
EVENING JOURNAL
43



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 15, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 15 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 16 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
EVENING JOURNAL
JAN 18 1943

LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
ITEM
JAN 14 1943

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, S. C.
~~DAILY MAIL~~
Independent
JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From
CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW

This Clipping From MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
JAN 15 1943

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HENDERSON, N. C.
DISPATCH
JAN 15 1943

This Clipping From CUMBERLAND, MD.
NEWS
JAN 15 1943

DEBUTS AS SPEAKER

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York city as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

Unaza was Governor
Louisiana during the early
of the American Revol
against England, and thi
this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americar ones.

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho
descending hurriedly from
It rolls itself into a ball
drops, depending on its t
elastic scales to break the f

* * *

Daniel Boone was burie
Missouri in 1820; in 1845 h
mains, with those of his [32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe JAN. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: ". . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—". . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
EVENING JOURNAL

'43

LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex.

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD

JAN 18 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JAN 18 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From SUNBURY, PA.
ITEM

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

Brian Aherne Joins Gallery of Ace Sleuths

The name of Jeff Troy may safely be added to that long list which includes Sherlock Holmes, Arsene Lupin, Philo Vance, Nero Wolfe, Hercule Poirot, Perry Mason, Nick Charles and other famed fictional sleuths. Only, in adding Je[illegible] name to the list be sure [illegible] is lost in a scuffle with her husband. Without clothes and without money, how she gets to Palm Beach, picking up and wowing the richest man in the world (Rudy Vallee) en route is a riot of fun and ingenuity. When she arrives there on board Vallee's yacht, McCrea is waiting for her. Where he got his money for the trip is another funny facet of Sturges' sparkling plot construction.

[illegible] Daniel Boone was buried in Missouri in 1820; in 1845 his remains, with those of his [illegible] Unrest was Governor Louisiana during the early of the American Revolu against England, and the this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americ onies.

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho descending hurriedly from It rolls itself into a ball drops, depending on its e elastic scales to break the f

[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
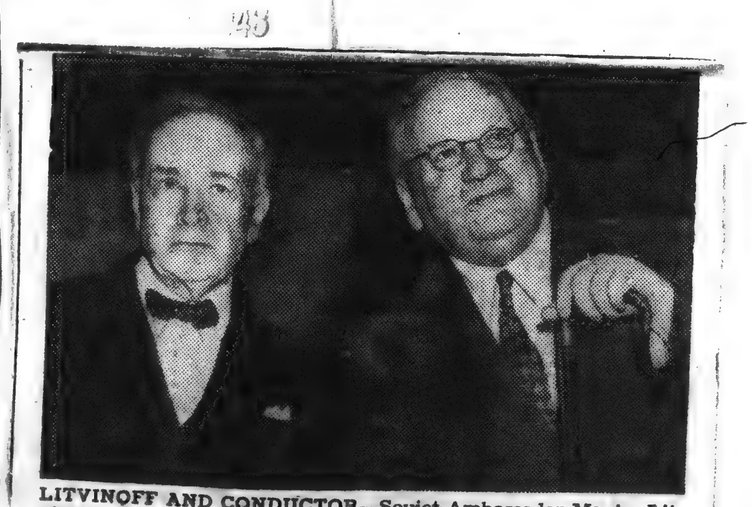
EVENING JOURNAL
JAN 10 1943



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 18 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

1942

SECOND FRONT

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

(Central Press)

2—More tornadoes sweep Midwest, 22 dead.
Coal mine explosion near Morgantown. which includes Sherlock Holmes
Arsene Lupin, Philo Vance, Ne
Wolfe, Hercule Poirot, Perry Maso
Nick Charles and other famed fi tional sleuths. Only, in adding de mystic name to the list be sure

Uruapa was governor
Louisiana during the early
of the American Revol
against England, and th
this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americ
onies.

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho
descending hurriedly from
It rolls itself into a ball
drops, depending on its t
elastic scales to break the f

* * *

Daniel Boone was burie
Missouri in 1820; in 1845 h
mains, with those of his

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe — Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
EVENING JOURNAL
JAN 43

LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

Christian Science Monitor - Jan. 11, 1943

...in Recital—Art. Ex...

Robert Casadésus

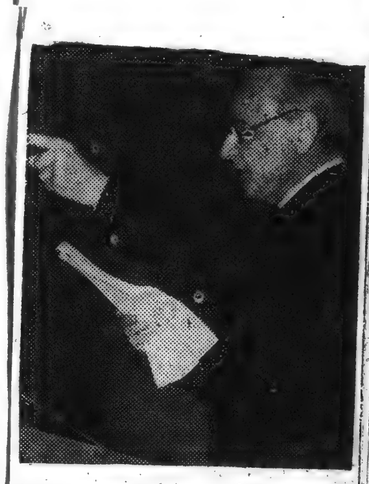
Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 13 1943

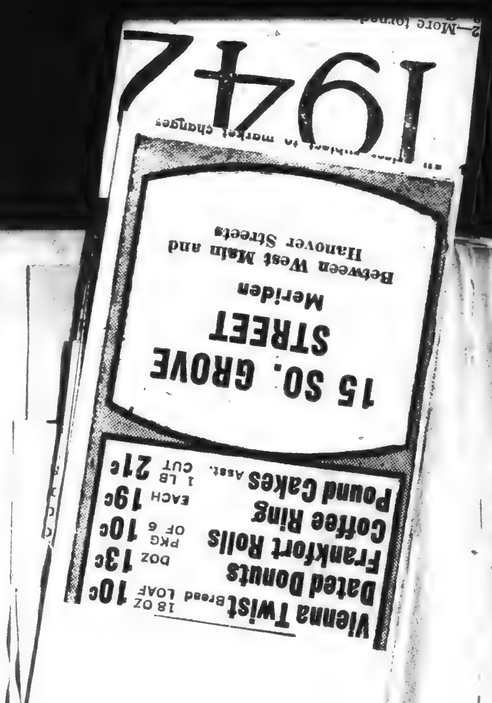
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.



Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.



[32]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe — Jan. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor — Jan. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

WHAT IS THE AVERAGE AGE OF

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 16 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 16 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
EVENING JOURNAL
1943

LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center, near Lenox, Mass.

[32]

Unrage was governor
Louisiana during the early
of the American Revol
against England, and th
this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americ
ones.

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho
descending hurriedly from
It rolls itself into a ball
drops, depending on its t
elastic scales to break the f

* * *

Daniel Boone was burie
Missouri in 1820; in 1845 h
mains, with those of his

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Symphony Broadcasts Popular Over Country

Boston Globe JAN. 10, 1943

3000 Enthusiastic Letters Received at Symphony Hall

As everyone expected, the return to broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has met with utmost public enthusiasm. After only two broadcasts of the regular Saturday evening concerts, 3000 letters have been received at Symphony Hall. Each mail brings more.

Nearly every letter and postcard tells the same story: the concerts were marvelous and the reception good; we're glad the whole series is to be carried on the air, and can we have this or that piece of music on future programs?

A man of keen ingenuity and great patience in research, Mr. Laning Humphrey of the Symphony Hall press staff, sat down to spend a quiet evening with these 3000 pieces of mail. What he found will reveal significantly what the American public wants to hear in broadcast serious music, and when.

Statistics is a dreary business, but perusal of about 100 representative communications selected out of the 3000 brought to light some engaging facts. The writers were in some cases trained musicians, but the great majority were Mr., Mrs. and Miss Average Citizen, who like symphonic music.

There were businessmen, lawyers, United States and Canadian Army men; a professor of English, a Southern banker who used to usher at the Sanders Theatre concerts when he was in college, a New Jersey woman who heard the first Boston Symphony concert in 1881, a man who had waited on Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra's founder, at a New York hotel years ago; an engineer, and a regional member of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

Some Former Bostonians

Some were former Bostonians, including one who lives in Oregon "very near to the most westerly point in the United States," and who remembers Boston's old Music Hall. One was a New Yorker working in a defense plant in Arkansas.

The missives came from 36 states, from Washington, D. C., and Canada. They came from Winters, Calif. (a blasphemous name for that fair state!); Avalon, Ga.; Libertyville, Ill.; Chisholm, Me.; Verona, N. J., and from Massachusetts' own Egypt, where you won't find a Pharaoh in the town.

Several different approaches to the enjoyment of the concerts are evident. But upon the performance, the interpretation and the deep, rich orchestral tone, there is virtually unanimous approval. Some people talked about the programs, some about the technicalities of reception and transmission. There were a few complaints of poor reception, but most said the reception was good, including one gentleman in Adams, Mass., who tuned in a Montreal station. (The last time he had heard a Boston Symphony broadcast several years ago, was in Kodaikanal, India, over short wave!)

Many suggested that the broadcasts ought to be longer than one hour. A Kentucky listener deplored local curtailment of those precious 60 minutes by "a most dreadful commercial program." There were numerous expressions of hope that the Boston Symphony will make more recordings. One woman said her "best record" is of Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature," made by the Boston Symphony in Karl Muck's day.

There were numerous requests for future programs. Among the compositions called for are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the Sibelius Seventh, anything by Mahler, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak; the Rumanian Rhapsodies of Enesco, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, choral works, "Schumann, Mozart and the like," and three progressive writers nominated Howard Hanson, John Alden Carpenter, Stravinsky of "Oedipus Rex," Carlos Chavez, Ernest Bloch, Aaron Copland and that almost legendary—and mostly unplayed—composer, Charles Ives.

What They Said

Now for some quotations from these letters and cards:

Houlton, Me.—"While sub-zero winds howled outside I drew my chair to the open fire and listened. . . . I am deeply grateful." Birmingham, Ala.—"A splendid, intoxicating concert!" Lincoln, Neb.—"Finest ever heard on the air. . . . A perfect job of radio engineering." San Francisco, Calif.—"The greatest treat on radio." Westminster, Mass.—"I bought my first radio years ago because you were broadcasting. It is a great joy to hear you again."

Long Branch, N. J.—"It is when one is privileged to hear radio programs like that one that a radio is treasured." Whittier, Calif.—"I am convinced that whatever you play will be just what I want to hear." Englewood, N. J.—"My husband and I thoroughly enjoyed your performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . and will try to plan remaining at home Saturday evenings."

Someone in California evidently didn't know that the Boston Symphony was the first great American orchestra to broadcast regularly, back in the 1920s, for he said: " . . . as a first performance on the radio it was very good." Baltimore, Md.—"I don't expect to make any engagements for Saturday evenings this Winter." Franklin, Mich.—"The biggest event in my 1943 life is to be the broadcasts of your orchestra."

Seattle, Wash.—" . . . perfect renditions. Prokofieff the way it should be played. I hope Toscanini was listening." (So do we.—Ed.)

Well, there you are.—C. W. D.

Christian Science Monitor - JAN. 11, 1943

in Recital—Art. Ex

Robert Casadésus

Who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening as soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto, in C minor.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in Town Hall in New York City as he made his debut as a speaker in a musical forum for the armed forces. Dr. Koussevitsky, speaking on "Music and Our Civilization," raises his hand to emphasize a point in his talk.

(Central Press)

555 Stephens St.

OMMODITIES TRADING

This Clipping From
PERU, ILL.
NEWS HERALD
JAN 13 1943

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

At Symphony Broadcast

James G. McDonald, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 10 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD

Koussevitzky Leads the Russian Program at Carnegie Hall

An audience of 3,000 crowded Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Saturday afternoon concert of the season. The program consisted of three Russian symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical," Shostakovich's Sixth and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

Since the conductor played both the modern symphonies here with the orchestra last April, and since his interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Symphony is deservedly famous, the concert does not call for extended comment. But the orchestra, as usual, sounded superb, and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were masterly.

All three performances were notable for their color, intensity and singing melodies. But the audience reserved its greatest enthusiasm for the work it knew best, the Tchaikovsky, which came as the peak of an afternoon of wonderful playing.

R. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LUBBOCK, TEX.
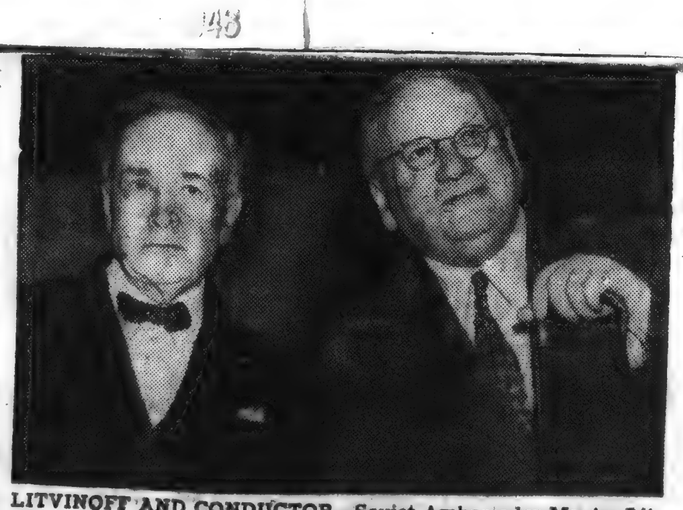
EVENING JOURNAL
1-13



LITVINOFF AND CONDUCTOR—Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff (right) sits with Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky after a concert at the Berkshire Music Center near Lenox, Mass.

[32]

Unrega was governor
Louisiana during the early
of the American Revol
against England, and thi
this Spanish colony passed contraband to the Americ
onies.

* * *

The Pangolin species of eater has a unique metho
descending hurriedly from
It rolls itself into a ball
drops, depending on its t
elastic scales to break the f

* * *

Daniel Boone was burie
Missouri in 1820; in 1845 h
mains, with those of his

How Shostakovich in His 7th Symphony Foretold Leningrad

GLOBE JAN. 20, 1943

Wherever he is in Soviet Russia, Dmitri Shostakovich must be smiling grimly now that the Nazis have been chased from Leningrad. A year ago and more, he foretold the triumphant lifting of the siege in that savage march of the Seventh Symphony, in which is expressed the sheer stubborn guts of people who will die before they will yield to a foreign invader.

SHOSTAKOVICH

In more ways than one that Seventh Symhony may logically be titled the "Leningrad" Symphony. Most of it was composed in a Leningrad cellar during the first, horrible Winter of siege.

Day after day, Shostakovich reported to his post as fire warden during those months. He is a tall, thin man with thick spectacles that emphasized his owlish expression. In his bulky fire warden's uniform, heavy gauntlets and ornate helmet he looked a little ridiculous, to judge by pictures that reached American newspapers. But certainly none of his fellows on that squad thought it amusing that so impractical a person as a composer should be detailed to put out fires.

Respected as Great Composer

Those colleagues respected Shostakovich for what he was: Russia's leading composer, a family man fond of children and a man who on Sundays went to watch the soccer matches.

The shy and meditative composer as a good citizen of the Republic he knew his Russians and he lived with them. As a sensitive man he probably realized more keenly than did they that his little squad was, fundamentally, a microcosm of the whole, vast Republic of Soviet Socialist Republics.

These men and millions more just like them; women and children, would all fight bombings and fires, bullets, wounds and privations. There would be no defeat.

It may be he spoke of these things to the men who watched with him. It is quite likely that of the music which was taking form in his mind, he said nothing. Most composers don't.

Went Home and Worked

When he went home Shostakovich might be tired. But there was work to do. The music must be got on paper. And so, week after week, the heap of ruled paper with little black dots grew higher and higher.

Whether he knew it or not, it was an astonishing thing that Shostakovich was doing. He intended that Seventh Symphony to be a salute to his loved native city. He intended to express in that music a Russian's love of country, and the fierce resolution of all the Russians, as exemplified in the besieged people of Leningrad, that the Nazis should not win.

Now it is a familiar aspect of creative art that most strong emotions are not expressed when they are experienced, but long afterwards, when emotion "recollected in tranquillity" is worked upon by the mellowing process of time's passing, a process highly important in the creation of great art.

Shostakovich was here reversing the rule. He set down his music in heat and speed, transmuting his passionate feelings into symbols of sound almost as he felt them.

Three movements were finished by the time the political authority of the Kremlin decided that Shostakovich and his work were safer in distant Kuibyshev. To the Russian state an artist is not an eccentric; he is as valuable as a chemist, an athlete or an electric welder. No chances must be taken with the safety of that Seventh Symphony.

Flew to Kuibyshev

Off to Kuibyshev in a plane, went Shostakovich and his family. There he had completed the fourth and last of the lengthy work by December of 1941. In March came the first performance. The world heard about it. The world was given to know that here was music of astonishing power and passion, thanks in part to the eloquent reporting of Eugen Petroff, an able Soviet newspaperman, who later was killed in Sevastopol.

Petrov went to rehearsals of the Seventh Symphony, and to that fabulous first performance. He recognized the Russian countryside in the reflective section of the first movement. He found, as the composer intended people to find, the whole epic resistance of the Russians in that long, crescendant march that begins so gently and finishes in one of the most savage bursts of aural defiance ever conceived in all history of music. In the third movement, as he declared in a dispatch printed in the Globe, Petrov found an epic expression of grief for the fallen, music too stoic for tears or lamentation.

So that is the Seventh, or "Leningrad" Symphony, whose prophecy has now come true. In time to come, it will doubtless be looked back upon as a prophecy of the deliverance of all Russia. C. W. D.

Casadésus With Symphony

Christian Science Monitor
JAN. 15, 1943

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin this week and next is once more occupying the Boston Symphony Orchestra dais during the midwinter vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky. Well liked nowadays by audience and orchestra, he was welcomed warmly yesterday afternoon.

His program was made up of Respighi's orchestral arrangement of sixteenth-century dances and airs for the lute; Strauss' "Don Quixote," and the Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No. 4, in C minor, with Robert Casadésus as soloist. A badly assorted list, which looks as if it had been put together because each of the works was about due for a hearing.

Mr. Casadésus, a member of the famous French family of musical and dramatic artists, had appeared in a Monday-Tuesday program of the Boston orchestra in 1938, but apparently had not been heard before in the longer series. He revealed himself as a virtuoso of formidable powers, well equipped technically and temperamentally to play this work of his fellow countryman. He received an ovation.

* * *

The concerto itself is not very rewarding today. It is distinctly a virtuoso piece, which often calls upon the soloist to produce orchestral sonorities while the orchestra behind him sits idle or strums an accompaniment — obviously a wasteful and futile undertaking. The thematic material is not sufficiently striking to justify so much reiteration as the composer has given it. And the constant reiteration is not a satisfactory musical substitute for the development that is lacking.

"Don Quixote" ranks high among Strauss' tone poems, and parts of it still have the power to charm us with their intricate texture, their sensuous tone, and their brilliant instrumental colors. But texture, tone, and color, applied to a composition which has many measures that are dull and some that are downright vulgar, are not enough.

* * *

Like all descriptive music, this must lean heavily upon non-musical factors. If you listen to it purely as music, its faults become immediately apparent. And whether you are willing to overlook these for the sake of the descriptive values depends upon whether you are greatly entertained by the specifically Teutonic notion of humor.

The soloists yesterday were Jean Bedetti, cellist, and Jean Lefranc, violist, who proved that it is quite unnecessary for the orchestra to go outside its own ranks for a presentation of "Don Quixote." Incidentally, Mr. Speyer distinguished himself, as he has been doing for several weeks during the absence of Mr. Gillet, with his oboe solo work.

Mr. Burgin directed the whole with authority, if not with an illuminating imagination. He also did well by the Respighi suite, of which the Villanella, by an unknown composer, is especially notable for its atmosphere.

Post MUSIC JAN. 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducts the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, who is away on his annual Winter vacation. The program is satisfying if not more than that, bringing Respighi's First Suite of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (one number omitted); the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, with Jean Bedetti as cello soloist, and the Fourth Piano Concerto by Saint-Saens, in which the solo part is played by Robert Casadesus.

"Don Quixote" is by far the most substantial music of the list—if you like Strauss. And if you don't like Strauss, that is too bad, because good Strauss is good entertainment. In our time of virtuoso orchestras and conductors, "Don Quixote" has come to be one of those elaborate pieces over which an interpreter can work, polishing and building up details, until he has fashioned a super-performance: glittering, sophisticated, highly colored and certain to electrify an audience.

Yesterday's "Don Quixote" was not of this sort at all. Mr. Burgin read it with comparative simplicity, with a fleet, imaginative approach and a high degree of restraint. The result was a glowing, lightly poetic interpretation. Mr. Bedetti played the solo depicting Cervantes' Knight in much the same manner—and with a gorgeous tone—so that you had the effect of a rounded and logically conceived performance quite different from the way "Don Quixote" has been done in Boston in recent years.

This manner is not necessarily superior to the more sophisticated one, but its very difference was interesting and enjoyable. As usual, Jean Lefranc gave a beautiful account of the viola solo delineating Sancho Panza.

While no stranger to Symphony Hall, Mr. Casadesus had not previously been soloist in the "regular" series. The Concerto he played yesterday is probably as trivial a Concerto as ever has been written, but it is triviality with a light touch and effectiveness.

Saint-Saens was one of music's gifted and superficial children. The C minor Concerto is about as nourishing as spun sugar—and just as tasty. It has nothing much to say, but it speaks with delightful brilliance. You can sit back, listen easily and have a fine time when so technically dexterous a musician as Mr. Casadesus is at the piano. At the end, yesterday, all hands received a noisy ovation.

About all you can say for Respighi's blown-up arrangement of those nice little archaic dances is that it's too bad Hollywood never got him to write some "mood music" for the fillums. C. W. D.

HERALD - JAN. 16

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 12th program of its 62nd season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Robert Casadesus, pianist, was the soloist in the Saint-Saens Concerto, and eJan Bedetti, cellist, and Jean Lefranc, violist, were the soloists in "Don Quixote." The program was as follows:

Respighi
Old Airs and Dances for the Lute
Strauss......"Don Quixote," Op. 35
Saint-Saens
Concerto for Piano in C minor, No. 4, Op. 44

It was definitely the soloist's day at the symphony yesterday, all three of them being responsible for some especially beautiful and refined playing. In point of fact, they lifted the quality of the whole concert far beyond its intrinsic value both as to music and as to performance, orchestrally speaking, for while the ensemble playing had all its customary brilliance and assurance, it soared off the ground only in the performance of the enchanting Respighi suite.

There is no question but that Richard Burgin, with every performance, grows in stature both as interpretative artist and as orchestral technician. In the latter capacity his gifts are particularly noteworthy, and he obtains the utmost clarity in matters of attack, unity and orchestral balance. In achieving this, however, he occasionally allows the inner substance of the music to speak for itself, which, of course, is only possible in the smallest and most sensitive chamber ensembles. Yesterday this objective approach was true only of "Don Quixote," for it must be said he got inside of the Respighi, and there isn't much in the Saint-Saens Concerto to get inside of.

The success of the Strauss masterpiece was thus in great measure due to Jean Bedetti's extraordinarily sensitive conception of the voice of the tragi-comic Don. The conductor's idea of the work was more along the lines of a symphonic composition which happened to have prominent sections for the 'cello, a viewpoint which diminished to some extent the tragic implications of Don's picaresque adventures. Yet when the soloist had the opportunity, as in the variation of the vision of Dulcinea, or in the death of Don Quixote, he drew out all the pathetic nobility of the character, achieving a tone of incomparable warmth and beauty. While his technic was flawless throughout, his production of the legato tone was especially notable. It is true that other cellists have made the part more spectacular, but few have endowed it with quite the same personality or insight.

In the less prominent viola part, Jean Lefranc gave the character of Sancho all his bustling earthiness, while Julius Theodorowicz in the solo violin part was most satisfactory. The orchestra responded to Mr. Burgin's direction with considerable vigor, yet frequently wanted in the glowing sonorities of which it is so capable. After the interval, Robert Casadesus appeared (and made a triumph) in Saint-Saens' facile C minor piano concerto. There are few pianists today with his gift for ensemble playing, and not in recent years has so perfectly in-

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 22 1943

MUSIC

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night was of the relaxing rather than of the exhausting sort—just what, probably, the times require. No groaning discord, no spiritual wrestling. Richard Burgin conducted, honestly and well.

A harmless suite by Bach, the one in B minor for flute and strings, was assigned to put the listeners into the proper mood. The diminished orchestra, the friendly nature of the tunes, and the fluent artistry of Georges Laurent gave a touch of intimacy and informality to the proceedings. Mr. Laurent was applauded with justice and endurance for his graceful flute solos, and Mr. Burgin earnestly pushed him forward to acknowledge the praise.

This was followed by the prelude to "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, which was the best part of the program. Mr. Burgin provided a far more poetic reading than might have been expected, and the voices of the orchestra were particularly persuasive. All in all, one was transported quite out of the moment. The prelude came to an end too soon, which is a certain sign that the composer has spoken beautifully and enough.

The introduction and wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or" was plodding, and sometimes noisy without brilliance. Mr. Burgin could not seem to make it catch fire.

Mahler's first symphony, in D major, is easy to listen to, though when one has heard, one is not certain whether one has gained much. There are comfortable melodies and effective orchestration; Mr. Burgin displayed these advantages competently.

There was gratifying applause for conductor and orchestra.

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

JUN 20 1943

Music Foundation

The Koussevitzy Music Foundation has approved grants for symphonic compositions to be written by Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok and William Schuman, and for chamber music compositions by two young American composers, William Bergsman of the Eastman School of Music and Robert M. Palmer, University of Kansas. This is the second series of grants by the foundation, which was set up in 1942 in memory of Natalie Koussevitzy.

Boris Goldovsky Lectures at Symphony Luncheon

The first of a series of "Symphony Luncheons" was held in the Oval Room of Hotel Copley Plaza yesterday noon. Boris Goldovsky, head of the New England Conservatory's opera school and of the Longy School's piano department, talked about "Don Quixote," by Richard Strauss.

Mr. Goldovsky gave an amusing yet logical analysis of what goes on in that musical story. Mr. Goldovsky is quite the most unusual lecturer on music this town has heard in some time. The audience yesterday was large. The luncheons will be on Fridays at 12:15. — C. W. D.

[33]

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JAN 22 1943

Ways To "Conquer Darkness"

Serge Kussevitzky is a man of great spiritual and intellectual power. Were he not, there could never have been the present status of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the great Berkshire Musical Center and that amazing youth orchestra which responded to the master's call last summer. He said something the other day which should give cheer to those who are worrying lest there be an end to culture when this war is silenced. He sees us "living through a vigorous upswing of cultural force and consciousness" —of reconstruction through a moral and spiritual rebirth and through the collapse of a decaying order of life."

"We have before us" said Kussevitzky "the matchless example of Russia, where art is a mighty weapon of war. Artists go to the front, into the heat of battle, where they witness true heroism, and learn to know what is life and death, love and hatred.

The artist must experience the very depth of human emotion to give an illuminating account of it. In his work he must portray the intensity of human misery and endurance; the untold tale of tears and blood. He must arouse patriotic ardor and sacred wrath in the hearts of fighting men. He must inspire deeds of great heroism and valor. This is the mission of the artist today.

Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man.

Let us conquer darkness with the burning light of art.

This is a very great statement of the service that today's art can do for the life of tomorrow as the outcome of today. We do not know that our musicians have gone into the jungles of the Solomons, or the wastes of the Aleutians or the sands and mud of Africa to put into music and song something of the immense reach of human emotions being there expressed. We do not know that anybody with brush or pencil or the sense of music has gone to the little Iowa town whence six Sullivan brothers went to the supreme sacrifice that a man can make of the ideals of his fellow men.

Were they to do this they might indeed immortalize "the undying beauty of the spirit of man," Perhaps some playwright has slipped out of Broadway to capture the grim reality of the pain that goes with the deeds of great heroism and valor.

No people of any age have ever undertaken such a magnificent sweep of the sacrifice of fighting men, all over the world as we of this America of today are now doing. We do not get what it all means because it is not presented to us in such gripping force.

Two groups of our men have gone right into the field, although over them today drapes the distinguishing power of the censor. They are the reporters who are following our men in every jungle, on every mountainside, in every desert, and even now in the eagle haunts of our airmen. Along with them are the photographers whose pictures are also censored, who are making records of terrain that we at home need to know about. Men who have actually endured the experiences of this tremendous and individualistic war have gotten their stories before the people who immediately make them best sellers. Those four men, all that were left of their outfit, in the Philippines, telling their story to William L. White, as "They Were Expendable," have given us a classic.

Is there some one who can create the music worthy of it? He must have escaped the lights of Broadway or the retreats where music is said to be best created, and gone right into the field, or like Mr. White, lived for a time with men fresh from the great battle. Could some day give us a truly great painting of these men living for weeks and weeks on a foodless, waterless eight-foot raft, something with the terrible power of the desire of human survival that Robert Trumnull has told us about? What a moving picture that would make. "Mutiny on the Bounty" has less in it than the simple faith of those men who believe that life and the conquest of death was their mission out there on the Pacific.

What of our arts is going to immortalize the incredible story of Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker forcing his men to keep themselves alive and this with the great help of a boy's prayers? There is material for a great drama, be it on the living stage or thru the moving picture. We in Holyoke have heard Romulo tell his story of the death of our kind of life upon the Philippines. He has written it into a stirring book. These are tremendous word pictures of what men have lived thru in the Pacific battleground.

There must be stories with equally gripping power from the Atlantic against which the censors have drawn a curtain which lifts occasionally when groups of men and women have been landed on far coasts after being thrown into the waters by German submarines. In Russia artists go to the front to get the tragedy, the power and the glory of it on a canvass, or in music or picture or the written word. The Russian artist is not afraid to give us life as it is lived during the horror of war. Nor is it all horror. There is the glory of sacrifice, the superb idealism which inspires a man to lay down his life so that great truths may not perish from the earth. We do well to think upon what Serge Koussevitzky is trying to tell us now.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 1943

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Offers Relaxing Program at the Metropolitan

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night was of the relaxing rather than of the exhausting sort—just what, probably, the times require. No groaning discord, no spiritual wrestling. Richard Burgin conducted, honestly and well.

A harmless suite by Bach, the one in B minor for flute and strings, was assigned to put the listeners into the proper mood. The diminished orchestra, the friendly nature of the tunes, and the fluent artistry of Georges Laurent gave a touch of intimacy and informality to the proceedings. Mr. Laurent was applauded with justice and endurance for his graceful flute solos, and Mr. Burgin earnestly pushed him forward to acknowledge the praise.

This was followed by the prelude to "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, which was the best part of the program. Mr. Burgin provided a far more poetic reading than might have been expected, and the voices of the orchestra were particularly persuasive. All in all, one was transported quite out of the moment. The prelude came to an end too soon, which is a certain sign that the composer has spoken beautifully and enough.

The introduction and wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or" was plodding, and sometimes noisy without brilliance. Mr. Burgin could not seem to make it catch fire.

Mahler's first symphony, in D major, is easy to listen to, though when one has heard, one is not certain whether one has gained much. There are comfortable melodies and effective orchestration; Mr. Burgin displayed these advantages competently.

There was gratifying applause for conductor and orchestra.

Bennett Item For Novelty At Symphony

Jan. 23, 1943
Christian Science

Robert Russell Bennett, the composer, was in attendance at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, when his "Sights and Sounds," and Orchestral Entertainment, received presentation under Richard Burgin, Assistant Conductor. At the close of the performance of the piece, which had second place in the order of exercises, Mr. Bennett appeared on the platform to acknowledge the applause of the audience. He visited town as one in a long succession of American men of music to whom Dr. Koussevitzky in late years has extended hospitality and given opportunity to address the public by means of big organized sound; and he may in fairness be said to have made, like those preceding him, a success with his production.

Dr. Koussevitzky was known to remark, when he instituted his liberal policy, that Americans were unaware of what interesting things their composers could do; but that was because native writers of music had only attained technical competence about the time he came to know them. They acquired their mastery, too, in a simple and natural enough way, by first getting a good general education at home and then going abroad and picking up the tricks of the symphonic trade through instruction and observation.

A whole generation developed right after the first World War, able to do anything, as far as the mechanism of the business was concerned, with an orchestra. They put out symphonies and tone poems with all the skill in the world. Dr. Koussevitzky perceived what they were up to, and let them have a chance to be heard.

Now that the record of the period is pretty well in, it would be enlightening to go back over what has been told to find out just what, first and last, has been said. Mr. Bennett's "Sights and Sounds" in a measure sums the matter up; nothing more could be demanded in the way of mastery of the means of expression, but does the piece tell much of anything?

Perhaps the composition on Friday afternoon was only played, and not really taken in hand by Mr. Burgin and interpreted. Yet there are those who hold that playing is all an orchestral work needs and that interpretation is but putting on extra flourishes. Possibly; but a little flourish might at least have brought excitement. Something, indeed, on the way from the opening movement, Union Station, and the closing one, Speed, did seem to attempt communication and fell short.

Globe MUSIC JAN. 23

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Engrossing and cleverly varied, the program chosen by Richard Burgin for the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts directed by him during Serge Koussevitzky's Winter vacation seemed. In actual performance at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, it proved less than that, yet not without remarkable moments.

To start, "Nobilissima Visione," the Suite drawn from Hindemith's ballet "St. Francis," was given first concert performance in Boston. Next came the first Boston Symphony performance of Robert Russell Bennett's "Sights and Sounds," followed by the "Romeo and Juliet" of Tchaikovsky, and "A Pagan Poem" by Charles Martin Loeffler.

As is happened, this reviewer was hearing the Hindemith excerpts for the first time, though the entire ballet has been given here. One thought of that earlier, perhaps finer work of Hindemith, "Matthias the Painter," whose idiom is also largely that of the "St. Francis" music. There are the same restless figurations interspersed with long melodies; the prevailingly diatonic style with pleasant harmonic dissonance.

Always the "absolute" and logical musician, it was characteristic of Hindemith that even in a work designed for the theatre he wrote in forms and a manner that enables the "St. Francis" music to be effective in the concert hall. Probably it makes no difference whether you listen to it as illustrative or abstract music. Acquaintance with a few excerpts is not a basis for judgment of the complete score. But without being dogmatic, one can say that the "St. Francis" excerpts do not have quite the strength of those from "Matthias the Painter."

Herald MUSIC JAN. 23, 1943

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin, conducting, gave the 13th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The assisting artists were Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano, and Louis Speyer, English horn. The program was as follows:

Hindemith....."Nobilissima Visione," Concert Suite
Robert Russell Bennett "Sights and Sounds"
Tchaikovsky....."Romeo and Juliet"
Loeffler....."A Pagan Poem" Op. 14

It looked good on paper. In fact, it looked like one of the season's most interesting programs, but somehow or other the first half just didn't jell. The concert came to a close, however, with a beautiful performance of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," an exceedingly interesting piece, and thus the day was saved.

To take them as they came, there was first the Hindemith suite derived from his ballet, "Saint Francis." While it is perfectly true—as Hindemith is quoted in the program—that the three extracts from the ballet stand by themselves as concert music, it is very difficult to sever the connection between them and, say, "Mathis der Maler" or the Concerto for Viola, for Hindemith's peculiarly neo-medieval idiom is present in all his works. In the case of the excerpts from "St. Francis" (which in its ballet form was certainly a tremendously moving choreographical composition reflecting the utmost perfection of the marriage of choreography and music), the reminiscence is disturbing. It may well be hindsight or inability to dismiss the remembrance of the ballet and all that, but the composition appeared to need choreography to achieve its full effect, notwithstanding the charm of the curious quotation of the old French song, Ce fut en Mai, or the power of the jagged melodic lines in contrast to the typical Hindemith employment of brass instruments.

It may have been we expected too much of Robert Russell Bennett's "Sights and Sounds." Not that we knew quite what we expected, except that Mr. Bennett's reputation as a composer of considerable wit and distinction has preceded him to Boston even though his most important work, the Abraham Lincoln Symphony, has never been performed here. However, the wit of "Sights and Sounds" never quite succeeds. Perhaps its idiom is dated, or perhaps we are just too dense to catch on to the joke. At any rate it is an enormously clever piece requiring a prodigious executant technique, and some of its effects, purely as sound, are astonishing. Whether or not the piece suffered in the deletion of three of its movements is impossible to say, but it may well have been a contributing reason for the suite's seeming lack of substance, even though that substance is admittedly frivolous in concept. Accepting it on its face value as "orchestral entertainment," however, it reveals Mr. Bennett as one of the country's most gifted technicians, and certainly earns for him the right to be heard here in his more serious moments.

The "Romeo and Juliet" went off nicely, as indeed it always does, but the performance of the Loeffler work was by all odds the most rewarding. Mr. Burgin obviously had assimilated every detail of the score, and the orchestra rose to the occasion. Jesus Maria Sanroma and Louis Speyer played the solo parts for piano and English horn, respectively, with extraordinary expressiveness, while the offstage effects of the three trumpets were handled with consummate skill. The work itself grows in stature with every performance and, heard several times more with as much interpretative authority as it was heard yesterday, undoubtedly will achieve its rightful place on the symphonic repertoire.

Next week George Szell will conduct the orchestra in Schubert's C Major Symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau" and an orchestral arrangement by Mr. Szell of the same composer's celebrated "Aus Mein Leben" Quartet.

mith's "Nobilissima Visione," a suite from the Ballet, "St. Francis," that concludes with the type of movement known as Passacaglia Mr. Hindemith is an acknowledged master of the higher mathematics of composition, both as pedagogue and as artist. His Passacaglia is the sort of music that makes an impression even when merely played. It is something to be called down from the shelf again some day.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasia and Loeffler's fragrant, impressionistic "Pagan Poem" filled out the bill.

To put the matter briefly, Mr. Bennett's "Sights and Sounds," subtitled "An Orchestral Entertainment," is trivial and dated stuff, involving a huge orchestra and a few quotations of once popular songs. In 1928, the year of its composition, the score won a $5000 prize. Time has weathered it drastically. Mr. Bennett acknowledged applause from the stage.

While Mr. Burgin read "Romeo and Juliet" without as much fire as could be desired, "A Pagan Poem" was at once rich-toned, clear and stirring. This example of Loeffler's refined imagination and orchestral skill has not faded as certain other of his tonal poems have lost their color and vitality. Yesterday it was pure enjoyment.—C. W. D.

MUCH VARIETY IN SYMPHONY

Hindemith, Tchaikovsky, Bennett on Programme

Post JAN. 23,

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is one thing that the four pieces which make this week's Symphony programme have in common: In one way or another they all belong to the genus "programme music."

Hindemith's "Noblissima Visione," the concert suite from his ballet, "Saint Francis," new to these concerts, can only be understood in relation to the action it was supposed to accompany. Otherwise, how account for the apparently intrusive and impertinent military march which interrupts its otherwise solemn and exalted progress?

Yesterday's other novelty, Robert Russell Bennett's "Sights and Sounds," subtitled, "An Orchestral Entertainment," comes much nearer to the absolutism that Hindemith mistakenly claims for his score. And while they do not make much sense in any connection, the four of the seven numbers played yesterday, "Union Station," "Highbrows," "Lowbrows" and "Speed," are a little more meaningful when we know what the composer is driving at.

In the case of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," half overture, half tone poem, the connection between the music and the play of Shakspere is pretty obvious, yet even here annotations are by no means superfluous. And when we come to Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem" the mere title is certainly not enough. He must at least have read the Eclogue of Virgil which inspired it, even though the composer did not follow the verses very closely.

The Suite of Hindemith begins in poignant beauty. As in parts of his "Mathis der Maler," there comes the thought of "Parsifal." Afterwards, "Parsifal" fades from the scene but, save in the aforementioned military march, "Mathias der Maler" remains. The shadow of this masterpiece has fallen across much, if not most of the music that has subsequently come from Hindemith's pen. Nevertheless, we are deeply grateful to Richard Burgin, who made and conducted this particular programme, for bringing the score, now four years old, to our attention.

Possibly Mr. Bennett's effects—the work that introduces him to Symphony Hall does not amount to much more—were striking effects in 1928, but today they fall rather flat. For this composition Mr. Bennett received a prize of $5000, something to cause Mozart and Schubert to turn over in their graves. Mr. Bennett was present yesterday to receive the cordial applause of the audience. Upon it and the Hindemith, conductor and orchestra had plainly spent the bulk of their efforts. The performance of Tchaikovsky's Overture was of a routine nature and that of Loeffler's Tone Poem might have had a little more glamour here and frenzy there, though the work held its own well with the other numbers.

Globe - JAN. 28, 1943

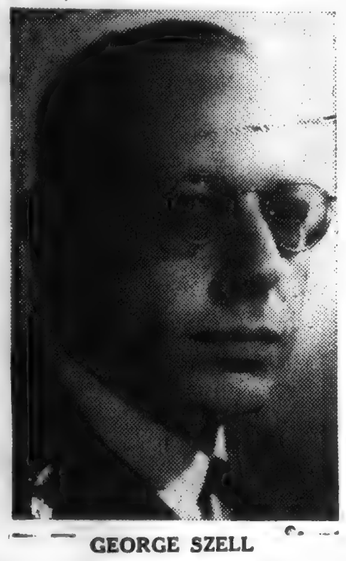
Szell Guest Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

Czech-Born Musician Toured Europe as Boy Piano Prodigy

By CYRUS DURGIN

If you are disorderly and inclined to put things off—and who isn't—take heart from what happened to George Szell. If this Czech musician, who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, hadn't put off returning a score to its composer, the music probably would have been lost forever.

It was one of the two copies of Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto Grosso that Mr. Szell, then in Holland, received in April, 1939. He was too busy to read it, but instead of following his rule of returning within two weeks all scores submitted to him, he decided to keep it a while longer. Well, the other score was lost when Martinu, fleeing from



GEORGE SZELL

Paris in 1940, had to leave it behind.

But thanks to Mr. Szell's procrastination, the story had a happy ending at Symphony Hall, Nov. 14, 1941, when Serge Koussevitzky, conducting from that score, gave first performance of the work in the presence of the composer. If Mr. Szell had been prompt, probably both cores would have been lost.

Speaks English Fluently

In meeting Mr. Szell, the first thing that impresses you is nonmusical. It is his remarkable command of English. One who has coped with the struggling speech of other Europeans was amazed to hear Mr. Szell toss off not only English but American, with the accents in the right places.

"English was the first foreign tongue I learned as a boy," he explains. "I read a lot of American literature then. Now all I need for a foreign language is a dictionary, a chart of grammatical inflections and a newspaper. With those I can get along nicely."

Musicians generally divide into two sorts: (1) Those whose life is exclusively music and (2) those with broader interests who are also sophisticated men of the world. Mr. Szell seems definitely to belong in the second category. Apart from music, he likes to play golf and read. His taste in reading is omnivorous, including politics and economics. He also likes mechanics and cooking.

Cosmopolitan By Choice

"I can make you a good clam chowder, New York style," he said. This reporter feebly observed that New York clam chowder is not discussed in these parts.

George Szell (you pronounce his name Sell) is cosmopolitan by choice. But he admits closest bonds with the people of "the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia that was and will be again."

"Though I was born in Budapest, I consider myself a Czecho-Slovak. My father was Hungarian, my mother a Slovak. I was educated in Vienna. But the most important period of my life was spent in Prague; I became a Czech citizen, and in Prague I met my wife."

Was Piano Prodigy

With his thick-lensed glasses, thinning hair brushed back, his expression of concentration, he reminds you a little of Stravinsky. But Szell is bigger than Stravinsky. For rehearsals he dons a black office coat.

At the age of 10 Szell was a piano prodigy and toured European cities. At 16 he took up conducting. He is now 46. He held important positions in Vienna, Berlin and Prague; he appeared regularly in Glasgow and London. A term of six weeks as guest leader of the St. Louis Orchestra, in 1930, was his introduction to the United States. He returned the following year. Since 1939, he has appeared with the N. B. C., the Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras.

"And now comes the crowning event of my life, the Boston Symphony."

"It is a good orchestra, isn't it?" commented the interviewer with Bostonian reticence.

"That is a slight understatement," grinned Szell. Then becoming serious: "This orchestra is altogether unique. Anything you could say in praise of the Boston Symphony would be too little."

This Clipping From
SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL JAN 24

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
JAN 7 194

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
JAN 24 1943

THE ARTS IN WARTIME.

It is Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the brilliant Boston Symphony, speaking in New York's Town Hall:

> The effects of wars and revolutions upon the fine arts, and culture in general, have been twofold. Either the arts succumb to extreme materialism, demoralization and decay, or, to the contrary, they herald an epoch of cultural and spiritual rebirth, a release of new thought, new creative forces and a new age in history.
>
> Within our generation and memory, we have witnessed a period of excessive materialism and of a marked decadence in art as an after-effect of the First World War. Today, with the advent of the Second World War, we are living through a vigorous upswing of cultural forces and consciousness.

Probably the conductor was stopped at this point by applause—the kind of applause that is given a commencement speaker for a particularly well-turned paragraph of generalities which, however, are not supposed to be checked too closely against the facts.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's words can be so checked. Consider the Sunday afternoon crowds which are making their way up the hill to the Art Museum in these days of gas rationing. Consider the demand which has grown up for etchings and lithographs at a price within the reach of the average purse. Consider the increase in the number of customers at the phonograph record counters, and especially the excellent music they are buying.

Here is measurable evidence of an "upswing of cultural forces." Perhaps it is evidence, too, of the truth of Mr. Koussevitzky's further statement that, "of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort and to inspire." This being so, the musician is urged to the fulfillment of a real duty:

> Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction, let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

MUSIC

JAN. 26

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fourth program of its supplementary series in Symphony Hall last night. The soloists were Robert Casadesus, piano; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Jean Lefranc, viola. The program follows:

Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (1st suite) ..... Respighi
Concerto in C for Piano and Orchestra (K. 467) ..... Mozart
"Don Quixote," Op. 35 ..... Strauss

It was evident on the face of it that the Monday-Tuesday audiences were drawing a plum in hearing Robert Casadesus play Mozart and in getting, to boot, the Respighi Suite and the Bedetti performance of Strauss's masterful "Don Quixote." Sure enough, it all developed last night as expected and proved to be a beautiful concert in every detail.

While Mr. Casadesus's performance of the Saint-Saens' Concerto at the regular series was, by the very nature of the music, a flashier, more brilliant affair, his performance of Mozart's K. 467 was inestimably the more rewarding. Just what the Mozart flair is is no matter for discussion in a paragraph, but believe us, Mr. Casadesus has it and to spare. His phrasing, his incredible delicacy yet virility of touch, his sensitivity to the ornaments and the inevitable trill climaxes and above all, his extraordinary feeling for the ensemble, all lend themselves to achieving what can only be called the Mozart miracle. And one took place last night.

In keeping with the character of the music, he was accompanied by a small ensemble, and the resulting precision and balance was testimony to the musicianship of soloist, orchestra and conductor. Moreover, the cadenzas, composed by the pianist, were in the true Mozartian style, that is to say, the best possible taste. The soloist was most enthusiastically received.

The concert began with an exceednigly fine performance of Respighi's first suite arranged from old dances and airs for the lute. This is one of the best things Mr. Burgin does, as he seeks out the antique progressions and the exquisite cadences, emphasizing them with devotion and rich—but not gaudy—effect. Jean Bedetti's performance of the solo part of Strausse's "Don Quixote" was noble and glowing, and the orchestra under Mr. Burgin played with all its accustomed virtuosity. Again, it seemed to us that there might have been more of an exalted feeling in some of the sections, but generally speaking, the interpretation was excellent. The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock.

Over the Local Skyways

JAMES G. MCDONALD, intermission commentator for the Blue Network broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the next program with SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, famed conductor of the distinguished orchestral organization. (Saturday 8:15 p. m. WKIP). The Symphony orchestra will not be broadcast this Saturday. Instead, Yeomen of the Guard, a Gilbert and Sullivan operetta will be heard this week only.

SPOKANE, WASH
RECORD
1/27/43

Acclaimed as the finest musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by the noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, is now heard Saturdays at 5:15 p. m., Spokane time over Blue network stations. Organized in 1881, the Boston Symphony has been under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky for the past 18 years.

NEAR-PERFECT CONCERT GIVEN

Remarkable Symphony by Boston Orchestra

Post JAN. 26.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A remarkable symphony concert, that of last evening and not to be missed by anyone who can manage to hear its repetition this afternoon, Richard Burgin, still at the helm, repeated two numbers from the programme of Jan. 15 and 16, Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Jean Lefranc, as 'cello and viola soloists respectively. Exceedingly good when first presented, this version of Strauss' masterpiece has grown better and better and last night it was just about perfection any way you regard it.

Robert Casadesus, who played the Saint-Saens' C minor Piano Concerto at the Friday and Saturday concerts mentioned above, is soloist at this, the fourth supplementary pair, his piece this time being the Mozart Concerto in C major, K. 467. Mr. Casadesus is a rare pianist, of whom we in Boston still know less than we should. His conception of Mozart's Concerto last evening was most interesting. While there was plenty of delicacy wnen that quality was appropriate, the French pianist did not hestitate to be vigorous and robust when the occasion demanded.

For much too long we have looked upon Mozart as a sort of Dresden-china composer, when as a matter of fact he was often, as in the first and last movements of this concerto, an incipient Beethoven. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra gave the soloist firm and sympathetic support, and the brilliant finish of the third movement provoked a storm of applause, as long continued as it was hearty. Another demonstration awaited Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Lafranc at the end.

MUSIC

JAN. 26 1943

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony last evening in a concert which will remain in memory for a long while. This was the fourth program of the "shorter" series, and there were many things which gave it distinction.

Mr. Burgin had set up an eminently tasteful and interesting program, beginning with Respighi's charming, graceful First Suite of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute. There followed Mozart's witty Piano Concerto in C major, (K. 467), in which Robert Casadesus was a peerless soloist, and finally a stunning performance of Richard Strauss' musical caricature, "Don Quixote."

Mozart wrote 25 brilliant piano concertos, the one played last evening being the third of four in the key of C major. In the best sense, this is entertaining music, and certainly Mozart meant it that way for he had a delicious sense of humor. Its first movement is grand, but gracious, the second, all suave beauty, yet daring (for Mozart's time) in its modernities. Mozart's gay, sparkling wit flashes in the final movement.

That which is so difficult of definition—style, embracing all aspects of performance—was the hall mark of Mr. Casadesus' playing. Needless to say, it was a technically flawless performance. The pianist seemed to be of one mind with the composer, and one would like to think of this as the definite interpretation. The orchestra accompanied him brightly, if not always with the customary Boston Symphony precision.

The Strauss was a marvel of perfection. This is a virtuoso piece which the orchestra took in stride. There was concentration on the satire, the humors and the humanity of Cervantes' tale. One could imagine a different, but certainly not a better performance than Jean Bedetti gave of the "title role." His cello tone qualities varied from the sheen of pure silk to the pungency of masculine tweed. Jean Lefranc's viola solos were of equal distinction. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.—J. W. R.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 24 1943

The Way He Wants It

To the Radio Editor:

A letter in last Sunday's TIMES criticized my pronunciation, as commentator of the Boston Symphony programs, of the first name of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The explanation is so simple and conclusive that it could have been guessed. My pronunciation is the one Dr. Koussevitzky prefers. JAMES G. MCDONALD.

New York City.

[35]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Globe - JAN. 28, 1943

Szell Guest Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

Czech-Born Musician Toured Europe as Boy Piano Prodigy

By CYRUS DURGIN

If you are disorderly and inclined to put things off—and who isn't—take heart from what happened to George Szell. If this Czech musician, who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, hadn't put off returning a score to its composer, the music probably would have been lost forever.

It was one of the two copies of Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto Grosso that Mr. Szell, then in Holland, received in April, 1939. He was too busy to read it, but instead of following his rule of returning within two weeks all scores submitted to him, he decided to keep it a while longer. Well, the other score was lost when Martinu, fleeing from

GEORGE SZELL

Paris in 1940, had to leave it behind.

But thanks to Mr. Szell's procrastination, the story had a happy ending at Symphony Hall, Nov. 14, 1941, when Serge Koussevitzky, conducting from that score, gave first performance of the work in the presence of the composer. If Mr. Szell had been prompt, probably both cores would have been lost.

Speaks English Fluently

In meeting Mr. Szell, the first thing that impresses you is nonmusical. It is his remarkable command of English. One who has coped with the struggling speech of other Europeans was amazed to hear Mr. Szell toss off not only English but American, with the accents in the right places.

"English was the first foreign tongue I learned as a boy," he explains. "I read a lot of American literature then. Now all I need for a foreign language is a dictionary, a chart of grammatical inflections and a newspaper. With those I can get along nicely."

Musicians generally divide into two sorts: (1) Those whose life is exclusively music and (2) those with broader interests who are also sophisticated men of the world. Mr. Szell seems definitely to belong in the second category. Apart from music, he likes to play golf and read. His taste in reading is omnivorous, including politics and economics. He also likes mechanics and cooking.

Cosmopolitan By Choice

"I can make you a good clam chowder, New York style," he said. This reporter feebly observed that New York clam chowder is not discussed in these parts.

George Szell (you pronounce his name Sell) is cosmopolitan by choice. But he admits closest bonds with the people of "the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia that was and will be again."

"Though I was born in Budapest, I consider myself a Czecho-Slovak. My father was Hungarian, my mother a Slovak. I was educated in Vienna. But the most important period of my life was spent in Prague; I became a Czech citizen, and in Prague I met my wife."

Was Piano Prodigy

With his thick-lensed glasses, thinning hair brushed back, his expression of concentration, he reminds you a little of Stravinsky. But Szell is bigger than Stravinsky. For rehearsals he dons a black office coat.

At the age of 10 Szell was a piano prodigy and toured European cities. At 16 he took up conducting. He is now 46. He held important positions in Vienna, Berlin and Prague; he appeared regularly in Glasgow and London. A term of six weeks as guest leader of the St. Louis Orchestra, in 1930, was his introduction to the United States. He returned the following year. Since 1939, he has appeared with the N. B. C., the Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras.

"And now comes the crowning event of my life, the Boston Symphony."

"It is a good orchestra, isn't it?" commented the interviewer with Bostonian reticence.

"That is a slight understatement," grinned Szell. Then becoming serious: "This orchestra is altogether unique. Anything you could say in praise of the Boston Symphony would be too little."

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
JAN 24 1943

THE ARTS IN WARTIME.

It is Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the brilliant Boston Symphony, speaking in New York's Town Hall:

> The effects of wars and revolutions upon the fine arts, and culture in general, have been twofold. Either the arts succumb to extreme materialism, demoralization and decay, or, to the contrary, they herald an epoch of cultural and spiritual rebirth, a release of new thought, new creative forces and a new age in history.
>
> Within our generation and memory, we have witnessed a period of excessive materialism and of a marked decadence in art as an after-effect of the First World War. Today, with the advent of the Second World War, we are living through a vigorous upswing of cultural forces and consciousness.

Probably the conductor was stopped at this point by applause—the kind of applause that is given a commencement speaker for a particularly well-turned paragraph of generalities which, however, are not supposed to be checked too closely against the facts.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's words can be so checked. Consider the Sunday afternoon crowds which are making their way up the hill to the Art Museum in these days of gas rationing. Consider the demand which has grown up for etchings and lithographs at a price within the reach of the average purse. Consider the increase in the number of customers at the phonograph record counters, and especially the excellent music they are buying.

Here is measurable evidence of an "upswing of cultural forces." Perhaps it is evidence, too, of the truth of Mr. Koussevitzky's further statement that, "of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort and to inspire." This being so, the musician is urged to the fulfillment of a real duty:

> Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction, let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

This Clipping From SIOUX [illegible] IOWA
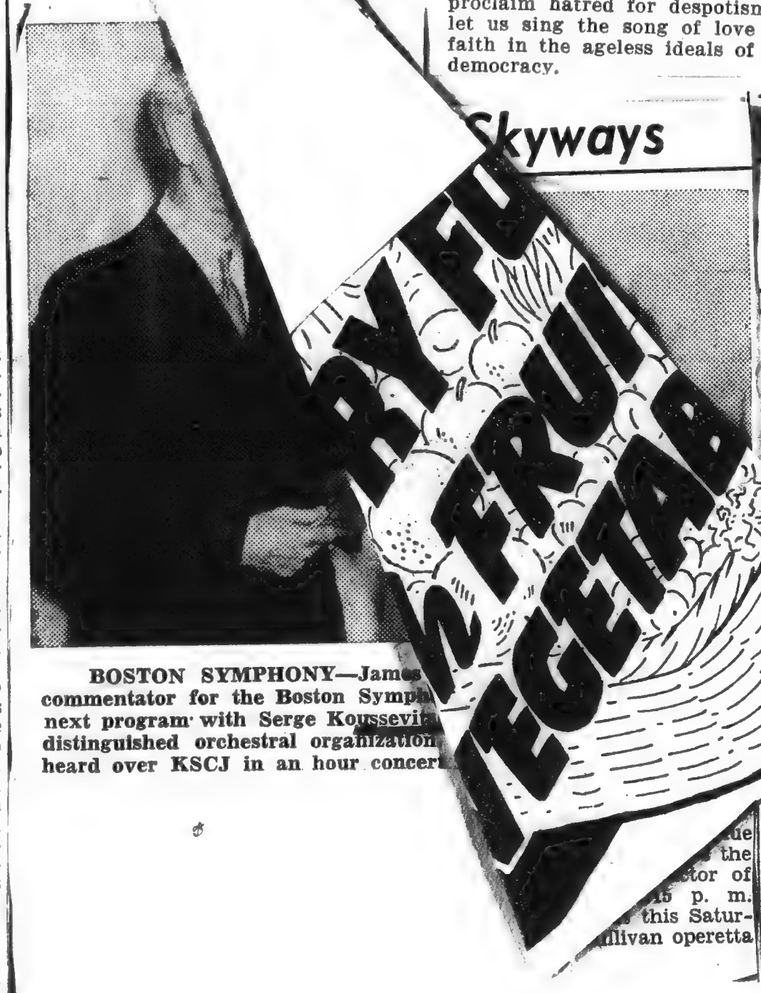
JAN 24



BOSTON SYMPHONY—James [illegible] commentator for the Boston Symph[illegible] next program with Serge Koussevit[illegible] distinguished orchestral organization [illegible] heard over KSCJ in an hour concert [illegible] the [illegible] tor of [illegible]5 p. m. [illegible] this Saturday [illegible] ullivan operetta

SPOKANE, WASH
RECORD
1/27/43

NEAR-PERFECT CONCERT GIVEN

Remarkable Symphony by Boston Orchestra

Post JAN. 26.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A remarkable symphony concert, that [illegible] last evening and not to be missed [illegible] anyone who can manage to hear its [illegible]ition this afternoon, Richard Bur[illegible]till at the helm, repeated two [illegible]s from the programme of Jan[illegible] Respighi's Old Dances and [illegible]he Lute and Strauss' "Don [illegible]ith Jean Bedetti and Jean [illegible]'cello and viola soloists [illegible]xceedingly good when [illegible]his version of Strauss' [illegible] grown better and bet[illegible]night it was just about [illegible]ny way you regard it.

[illegible] Casadesus, who played the [illegible]aens' C minor Piano Concerto [illegible]e Friday and Saturday concerts [illegible]ntioned above, is soloist at this, the [illegible]ourth supplementary pair, his piece this time being the Mozart Concerto in C major, K. 467. Mr. Casadesus is a rare pianist, of whom we in Boston still know less than we should. His conception of Mozart's Concerto last evening was most interesting. While there was plenty of delicacy when that quality was appropriate, the French pianist did not hesitate to be vigorous and robust when the occasion demanded.

For much too long we have looked upon Mozart as a sort of Dresden-china composer, when as a matter of fact he was often, as in the first and last movements of this concerto, an incipient Beethoven. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra gave the soloist firm and sympathetic support, and the brilliant finish of the third movement provoked [illegible] storm of applause, as long continued [illegible] it was hearty. Another demonstra[illegible]on awaited Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti [illegible]d Lafranc at the end.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 24 1943

The Way He Wants It

To the Radio Editor:

A letter in last Sunday's TIMES criticized my pronunciation, as commentator of the Boston Symphony programs, of the first name of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The explanation is so simple and conclusive that it could have been guessed. My pronunciation is the one Dr. Koussevitzky prefers. JAMES G. MCDONALD.

New York City.

Acclaimed as the finest musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by the noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, is now heard Saturdays at 5:15 p. m., Spokane time ov[illegible] Blue network stations. Organized [illegible] 1881, the Boston Symphony has bee[illegible] under the direction of Dr. Kousdevit[illegible]sky for the past 18 years.

[35]

MUSIC

JAN. 26

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fourth program of its supplementary series in Symphony Hall last night. The soloists were Robert Casadesus, piano; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Jean Lefranc, viola. The program follows:

Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (1st suite) ..... Respighi
Concerto in C for Piano and Orchestra (K. 467) ..... Mozart
"Don Quixote," Op. 35 ..... Strauss

It was evident on the face of it that the Monday-Tuesday audiences were drawing a plum in hearing Robert Casadesus play Mozart and in getting, to boot, the Respighi Suite and the Bedetti performance of Strauss's masterful "Don Quixote." Sure enough, it all developed last night as expected and proved to be a beautiful concert in every detail.

While Mr. Casadesus's performance of the Saint-Saens' Concerto at the regular series was, by the very nature of the music, a flashier, more brilliant affair, his performance of Mozart's K. 467 was inestimably the more rewarding. Just what the Mozart flair is is no matter for discussion in a paragraph, but believe us, Mr. Casadesus has it and to spare. His phrasing, his incredible delicacy yet virility of touch, his sensitivity to the ornaments and the inevitable trill climaxes and above all, his extraordinary feeling for the ensemble, all lend themselves to achieving what can only be called the Mozart miracle. And one took place last night.

In keeping with the character of the music, he was accompanied by a small ensemble, and the resulting precision and balance was testimony to the musicianship of soloist, orchestra and conductor. Moreover, the cadenzas, composed by the pianist, were in the true Mozartian style, that is to say, the best possible taste. The soloist was most enthusiastically received.

The concert began with an exceedingly fine performance of Respighi's first suite arranged from old dances and airs for the lute. This is one of the best things Mr. Burgin does, as he seeks out the antique progressions and the exquisite cadences, emphasizing them with devotion and rich—but not gaudy—effect. Jean Bedetti's performance of the solo part of Strausse's "Don Quixote" was noble and glowing, and the orchestra under Mr. Burgin played with all its accustomed virtuosity. Again, it seemed to us that there might have been more of an exalted feeling in some of the sections, but generally speaking, the interpretation was excellent. The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock.

MUSIC

JAN. 26 1943

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony last evening in a concert which will remain in memory for a long while. This was the fourth program of the "shorter" series, and there were many things which gave it distinction.

Mr. Burgin had set up an eminently tasteful and interesting program, beginning with Respighi's charming, graceful First Suite of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute. There followed Mozart's witty Piano Concerto in C major, (K. 467), in which Robert Casadesus was a peerless soloist, and finally a stunning performance of Richard Strauss' musical caricature, "Don Quixote."

Mozart wrote 25 brilliant piano concertos, the one played last evening being the third of four in the key of C major. In the best sense, this is entertaining music, and certainly Mozart meant it that way for he had a delicious sense of humor. Its first movement is grand, but gracious, the second, all suave beauty, yet daring (for Mozart's time) in its modernities. Mozart's gay, sparkling wit flashes in the final movement.

That which is so difficult of definition—style, embracing all aspects of performance—was the hall mark of Mr. Casadesus' playing. Needless to say, it was a technically flawless performance. The pianist seemed to be of one mind with the composer, and one would like to think of this as the definite interpretation. The orchestra accompanied him brightly, if not always with the customary Boston Symphony precision.

The Strauss was a marvel of perfection. This is a virtuoso piece which the orchestra took in stride. There was concentration on the satire, the humors and the humanity of Cervantes' tale. One could imagine a different, but certainly not a better performance than Jean Bedetti gave of the "title role." His cello tone qualities varied from the sheen of pure silk to the pungency of masculine tweed. Jean Lefranc's viola solos were of equal distinction. The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.—J. W. R.

Christian Science Monitor JAN. 28 1943

New Play Coming—Introducing Mr. Szell

A Visiting Conductor in Action

Two views of Georg Szell, who is directing the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

Symphony Guest Conductor Has Had Wide Experience

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Indications constantly come to notice that conductors are sensitive to music; and it transpires that Georg Szell, who directs the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, has a quick ear. From rehearsing with the Symphony players he has discerned that their auditorium possesses extraordinary acoustic qualities. To him, Symphony Hall comes up to the mark, or close to the mark, of the Leipsig Gewandhaus. Reverberation is what it ought to be for the sonorities of an orchestra. The sound has the right "float."

* * *

He can hardly be the kind of conductor that makes a cult of noise, or he would not have made such an observation about the concert room for which Prof. Wallace C. Sabine figured out the incidences and echoes at the time of construction. Then, for more evidence, we have but to look at the program billed for his appearances of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the Schubert Symphony in C and a couple of pieces from the works of Smetana.

Mr. Szell has had experience, too, with noise, having presented modern compositions from time to time with orchestras which he has directed. He has taken note of how audiences here and there respond. As reported of him, he finds the public of a New World community more tolerant of novelty than that of an Old World one. Americans will stay and listen to what gives them no particular pleasure, whereas Europeans will show dislike in plain terms, sometimes walking out in numbers, and again shouting disapproval.

As to artistic provenance, Mr. Szell is said to be satisfied with being called a Czechoslovakian musician. Outside of that he seems to claim association with no school. He learned to conduct by conducting, and he began taking the hard knocks of the business when rather young. In opera houses he got plenty of them; and while the discipline of opera does not invariably make good concert conductors, it has helped make some of the best of them.

* * *

Mr. Szell sees proportion and relative value in music, particularly in the composition aspect of it. He looks on a certain example of Mozart's composing as representing Mozart at the highest; on another example as representing Mozart after a comparatively unimportant fashion. Yet Mozart at second level surpasses in interest many another composer at top degree. The great man's half attempt goes for more, he finds, than the smaller man's full effort. We may believe, therefore, that he not only hears sensitively but that he also demands something deep down that is worth hearing.

As a figure on the platform, Mr. Szell reminds people somewhat of Igor Stravinsky, though he stands somewhat taller than Mr. Stravinsky. He conducts with a stick, and with plenty elaborate action. He finds special uses for the left hand; and altogether he commands the technicalities of his craft at their complete present-day development.

Serge Koussevitzky

Returning this week to the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his midwinter vacation.

This Clipping From TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
FEB - 1943

PAMELA MURRAY

When the Boston Symphony played in Providence the audience was embellished by Martha Sayles Nicholson, secretary of the Junior League, and E. Bushnell Pearce, popular Providencial

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There's no doubt about it. The Boston Symphony Orchestra responds at its very best only to the man who has made it such an extraordinary instrument: Serge Koussevitzky. He was back on the stand yesterday after an absence of more than a month, the balance of which had been passed on holiday in the south. And with his return, Symphony Hall seemed wholly natural once again.

Mr. Burgin had given us two excellent concerts. A week ago guest conductor George Szell obtained tonal brilliance. But only from the authority of Mr. Koussevitzky flows that combined depth, richness and clarity of tone, together with a remarkable balance among the string, wood, brass and percussion sections, which give the Boston Symphony its individual sound.

There was nothing venturesome about the program, which reflected Mr. Koussevitzky's ever-increasing tendency to repeat familiar masterpieces in alternate seasons. The "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, Debussy's "La Mer," and that Gargantuan tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, were all played in the first half of 1941. But unlike the steady diet of Brahms, Tchaikovsky, and so on, to which we are becoming accustomed, there was less stale familiarity in yesterday's list.

The Debussy and Strauss, for one reason, are music of infinite color and detail upon which the conductor can exercise his necromantic powers of imagination and lapidary polish.

And the "Italian" Symphony, most of it, effervesces like sparkling wine. Yesterday it flashed and bubbled through all three fast movements. The andante went a little faster, seemingly, than Mr. Koussevitzky generally takes it, and if anything gained thereby.

In some respects the performance of "La Mer" was unlike those one has heard from this orchestra and conductor. It gathered intensity as it unfolded. But most notably, it had a pictorial quality extremely vivid, along with an instrumental nimbus for background against which the main lines of the music stood out in bold contrast.

While Richard Strauss' 10-reel version of Nietzsche was going on, one thought of some of the old arguments against the piece: the "cheap" dance song, the melodramatic thunder of the introduction, the swollen counterpoint, and the silly pseudo-mysticism of the whole thing.

And then one thought of a personal inclination, generated gradually over a period of years, to forget Nietzsche and to listen to "Thus Spake Zarathustra" purely as music. From that point of view, the magnificence of much of the score remains untarnished, and the dance song episode seems no more trivial than any tune designed to accompany liquid refreshment.

All in all, the concert was splendidly played. There were a few conspicuous places where horns, trumpets and other instruments had their difficulties, but they were inconsequential.—C. W. D.

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

The Symphony Concert

By L. A. Sloper

After the excitements of last week, with its new Roy Harris symphony and the "Internationale," it was not surprising that there should be a sense of letdown in Dr. Koussevitzky's program for this week, which consists of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, no. 10; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" Suite.

This sense was aggravated yesterday by the fact that the conductor was in one of his most perverse moods during the first half of the program, which included the Handel and Beethoven numbers. Slow movements, it seemed, had never been so slow before, nor contrasts of tempo and dynamics so violent.

All this was magnificent, so far as it was regarded as a display of virtuosity on the part of the conductor and of the orchestra; but it was not the music that had been indited by Handel and Beethoven. Handel took on a Tchaikovskyan air, and Beethoven became a medium for a display of interpretative vagaries.

The extravagances which Dr. Koussvitzky sometimes permits himself are appropriate enough to a work like Rimsky's "Schéhérazade" Suite, which is a fairy tale, full of sound and color. But with the classic masters, such methods are out of place. They make us marvel at the capacities of the orchestra, but they leave Handel and Beethoven out of the picture.

The orchestra will be away next week. The following week, Mr. Burgin will conduct in Cambridge and Boston a program which will contain Dukelsky's new Violin Concerto, for first performance, and the first part of Mahler's Symphony No. 3, for the first time hereabouts.

[36.]

Christian Science Monitor JAN. 28, 1943

New Play Coming—Introducing Mr. Szell

A Visiting Conductor in Action

Two views of Georg Szell, who is directing the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

Symphony Guest Conductor Has Had Wide Experience

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Indications constantly come to notice that conductors are sensitive to music; and it transpires that Georg Szell, who directs the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, has a quick ear. From rehearsing with the Symphony players he has discerned that their auditorium possesses extraordinary acoustic qualities. To him, Symphony Hall comes up to the mark, or close to the mark, of the Leipsig Gewandhaus. Reverberation is what it ought to be for the sonorities of an orchestra. The sound has the right "float."

* * *

He can hardly be the kind of conductor that makes a cult of noise, or he would not have made such an observation about the concert room for which Prof. Wallace C. Sabine figured out the incidences and echoes at the time of construction. Then, for more evidence, we have but to look at the program billed for his appearances of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the Schubert Symphony in C and a couple of pieces from the works of Smetana.

Mr. Szell has had experience, too, with noise, having presented modern compositions from time to time with orchestras which he has directed. He has taken note of how audiences here and there respond. As reported of him, he finds the public of a New World community more tolerant of novelty than that of an Old World one. Americans will stay and listen to what gives them no particular pleasure, whereas Europeans will show dislike in plain terms, sometimes walking out in numbers, and again shouting disapproval.

As to artistic provenance, Mr. Szell is said to be satisfied with being called a Czechoslovakian musician. Outside of that he seems to claim association with no school. He learned to conduct by conducting, and he began taking the hard knocks of the business when rather young. In opera houses he got plenty of them; and while the discipline of opera does not invariably make good concert conductors, it has helped make some of the best of them.

* * *

Mr. Szell sees proportion and relative value in music, particularly in the composition aspect of it. He looks on a certain example of Mozart's composing as representing Mozart at the highest; on another example as representing Mozart after a comparatively unimportant fashion. Yet Mozart at second level surpasses in interest many another composer at top degree. The great man's half attempt goes for more, he finds, than the smaller man's full effort. We may believe, therefore, that he not only hears sensitively but that he also demands something deep down that is worth hearing.

As a figure on the platform, Mr. Szell reminds people somewhat of Igor Stravinsky, though he stands somewhat taller than Mr. Stravinsky. He conducts with a stick, and with plenty elaborate action. He finds special uses for the left hand; and altogether he commands the technicalities of his craft at their complete present-day development.

Serge Koussevitzky

Returning this week to the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his midwinter vacation.

This Clipping From TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
FEB -- 1943

PAMELA MURRAY

When the Boston Symphony played in Providence the audience was embellished by Martha Sayles Nicholson, secretary of the Junior League, and E. Bushnell Pearce, popular Providencial

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There's no doubt about it. The Boston Symphony Orchestra responds at its very best only to the man who has made it such an extraordinary instrument: Serge Koussevitzky. He was back on the stand yesterday after an absence of more than a month, the balance of which had been passed on holiday in the south. And with his return, Symphony Hall seemed wholly natural once again.

Mr. Burgin had given us two excellent concerts. A week ago guest conductor George Szell obtained tonal brilliance. But only from the authority of Mr. Koussevitzky flows that combined depth, richness and clarity of tone, together with a remarkable balance among the string, wood, brass and percussion sections, which give the Boston Symphony its individual sound.

There was nothing venturesome about the program, which reflected Mr. Koussevitzky's ever-increasing tendency to repeat familiar masterpieces in alternate seasons. The "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, Debussy's "La Mer," and that Gargantuan tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, were all played in the first half of 1941. But unlike the steady diet of Brahms, Tchaikovsky, and so on, to which we are becoming accustomed, there was less stale familiarity in yesterday's list.

The Debussy and Strauss, for one reason, are music of infinite color and detail upon which the conductor can exercise his necromantic powers of imagination and lapidary polish.

And the "Italian" Symphony, most of it, effervesces like sparkling wine. Yesterday it flashed and bubbled through all three fast movements. The andante went a little faster, seemingly, than Mr. Koussevitzky generally takes it, and if anything gained thereby.

In some respects the performance of "La Mer" was unlike those one has heard from this orchestra and conductor. It gathered intensity as it unfolded. But most notably, it had a pictorial quality extremely vivid, along with an instrumental nimbus for background against which the main lines of the music stood out in bold contrast.

While Richard Strauss' 10-reel version of Nietzsche was going on one thought of some of the old arguments against the piece: the "cheap" dance song, the melodramatic thunder of the introduction, the swollen counterpoint, and the silly pseudo-mysticism of the whole thing.

And then one thought of a personal inclination, generated gradually over a period of years, to forget Nietzsche and to listen to "Thus Spake Zarathustra" purely as music. From that point of view, the magnificence of much of the score remains untarnished, and the dance song episode seems no more trivial than any tune designed to accompany liquid refreshment.

All in all, the concert was splendidly played. There were a few conspicuous places where horns, trumpets and other instruments had their difficulties, but they were inconsequential.—C. W. D.

The Symphony Concert

By L. A. Sloper

After the excitements of last week, with its new Roy Harris symphony and the "Internationale," it was not surprising that there should be a sense of letdown in Dr. Koussevitzky's program for this week, which consists of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, no. 10; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" Suite.

This sense was aggravated yesterday by the fact that the conductor was in one of his most perverse moods during the first half of the program, which included the Handel and Beethoven numbers. Slow movements, it seemed, had never been so slow before, nor contrasts of tempo and dynamics so violent.

All this was magnificent, so far as it was regarded as a display of virtuosity on the part of the conductor and of the orchestra; but it was not the music that had been indited by Handel and Beethoven. Handel took on a Tchaikovskyan air, and Beethoven became a medium for a display of interpretative vagaries.

The extravagances which Dr. Koussvitzky sometimes permits himself are appropriate enough to a work like Rimsky's "Schéhérazade" Suite, which is a fairy tale, full of sound and color. But with the classic masters, such methods are out of place. They make us marvel at the capacities of the orchestra, but they leave Handel and Beethoven out of the picture.

The orchestra will be away next week. The following week, Mr. Burgin will conduct in Cambridge and Boston a program which will contain Dukelsky's new Violin Concerto, for first performance, and the first part of Mahler's Symphony No. 3, for the first time hereabouts.

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

[36.]

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns in Program of Old Favorites

Herald Feb. 6, 43

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 15th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4 in A ("Italian")
Debussy......"La Mer"
Strauss....."Also Sprach Zarathustra"

What with a program of oft-heard—and oft-discussed—favorites, the principal interest in yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the return, after a three weeks' vacation, of Dr. Koussevitzky. The performance was, of course, up to the usual standard, although it seemed to us that the first movement of the Mendelssohn was something of a scramble in tempo and the Strauss tone poem lacking in its customary finesse of execution...

Since everything on the program has been done within the last two seasons (and by no means neglected until then), what can you say about the music except that the Mendelssohn was elegant, the Debussy iridescent and the Strauss juicy? They have all been so catalogued for generations, and there appeared no reason in yesterday's performance to adjust the adjectives.

"La Mer," however, could be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra three times every season and meet with no objection from anyone. Possibly the most interesting of Debussy's orchestral works (the most "interesting" so far as Debussy's orchestral works are concerned is always the one you heard last), it is an utterly fascinating composition which reveals its secrets only on constant association.

The infinite subtleties of the work, the ever-shifting tonalities, dynamic stresses and textures, all achieved by the most calculated of orchestral technics, lie revealed to such a master of executive orchestral technic as Dr. Koussevitzky, and he calls out the most craftily conceived effect as no other living conductor can. As in the case of Ravel's "Daphne and Chloe," he has made "La Mer" singularly his own, and it is no local pride which spurs the above ecomium.

Dr. Koussevitzky has also made Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony his own, but here his enthusiasm is perhaps not so keenly shared. Not because the symphony is inferior stuff, for it definitely is not. On the contrary, it is the epitome of refinement and "politesse."

But it hardly has the substance to weather yearly hearings, and certainly we need no further proof that the orchestra can play it with incredible delicacy.

The concert came to an end with Strauss' inflated "Also Sprach Zarathustra." It has been performed better in the past, but there were certain things about it—the sforzando attack followed by an overpowering swell of volume in the opening chords, for instance—which lifted it onto a lofty plane of execution despite its occasional flaws, not the least of which was the pitch of the organ. Next week the orchestra is out of town. The program for the following week consists of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis and Schumann's First Symphony.

TWO 'FIRSTS' ON SYMPHONY LIST

Post

Works by Roy Harris and E. B. Hill Featured

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There were two "first times" at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, the "International" and Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony.

There was a connection between the two. The concert was designed to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and Mr. Harris' Symphony, which received yesterday its initial public performance, bears a dedication to our Russian Allies. When the country of his birth and that of his adoption became united in a common cause Dr. Koussevitzky was willing to let bygones be bygones so far as the Bolsheviki are concerned. This week's programme-book reprints an eloquent message which he sent to the leaders of the Russian army and navy last Tuesday.

The programme, devoted to contemporary composers, might be said offhand to list two pieces and a masterpiece. And the masterpiece is not Mr. Harris' Symphony but the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofieff, which was heard here yesterday for the third time, with Alexander Borovsky as the soloist.

The first number was the urbane, grateful Symphony No. 1 in B-flat of Edward Burlingame Hill. Both Mr. Hill and Mr. Harris were on hand yesterday to receive the plaudits of the audience.

Whether or not Mr. Harris is, as so many maintain, the foremost American composer, he is certainly the most earnest and most determined. In his music there is seldom a lighter touch and along with this seriousness goes a sense of striving. With each new symphony he seems to come nearer the goal, although the present work seems at first hearing less original, less individual than No. 3. (The choral Folk Song Symphony is a sort of side issue). It would not be fair to say this Fifth Symphony is unworthy of its dedication. It has energy and vigor. There is a fitting intimation of tragedy at the beginning of the second movement of long-continued, unbroken lyricism. The Finale, structurally rather involved, has an exciting climax.

Heard here yesterday for the fourth time, Mr. Hill's Symphony is soundly written. Its ingratiating themes, which made an immediate impression, are reheard with pleasure. Yet for all its charm it would be difficult to describe it as a work of marked originality.

Prokofieff, on the contrary, is himself alone. In the Concerto of yesterday, skillfully played by both soloist and orchestra, we find impeccable workmanship, a heady brilliance and a fascinating melodic invention, united with an unfailing ear for effect.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1943

Boston Little Affected

BOSTON—No radical changes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are expected as a result of new draft regulations. Of 110 members of the orchestra, only 20 are under 38, and almost without exception they are married men with children.

MUSIC

Globe Feb 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program at the Boston Symphony concerts this week is just what is needed to pull us out of the gray depths of the waning Winter.

It is a program for those romantically and dramatically inclined, and it consists of the Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, by Vaughan Williams; the First or "Spring" Symphony of Robert Schumann, and that grand pictorial Symphony by Hector Berlioz: "Harold in Italy." Jean Lefranc, first viola of the orchestra, is the soloist in the score last named.

This reviewer, who more than once has expressed his conviction that music is fundamentally an abstract art, is pushed into the embarrassing corner which is always waiting for him who expresses opinions freely.

The fact is that he cannot listen to the Tallis Fantasia, which is abstract or absolute music, without inventing a picture to go with it.

And conversely, he readily can hear "Harold in Italy," which is pictorial music, simply as a symphonic work.

It is an odd quirk of psychology, but there it is. Most of all, the modal harmony of the Vaughan Williams music, with its angular cadences, impels one to think of this glowing string music in terms of what one imagines 16th Century England to have been.

Going on from there you can paint yourself as archaic a picture as you like, all of which, nevertheless, will have no logical connection with the score.

"Harold in Italy," a Romantic masterpiece of the first order, all fire, passion, color and melodrama, can be heard as a set of four pictures.

And yet one can be absorbed by the sheer sound and instrumental color of Berlioz and not think for a moment about his hero Harold, portrayed by the solo viola. Not that "Harold in Italy" is to be mistaken for a true Symphony. That it certainly is not.

The work is actually an esthetic hybrid by a composer whose greatest gifts were for dramatic expression, and who also had one of the most unusual talents for writing melody in all the history of music.

What must not be overlooked, however, is the fact that there is easily recognizable symmetry of form.

Listening to yesterday's performance of Berlioz, conducted with so much passion and warmth by Serge Koussevitzky, one hoped that, when the Boston Symphony again makes records, this composition will be among the first to be done.

Mr. Lefranc was a most admirable soloist, performing his role with finesse, great beauty of tone and expert musicianship. The strings were excellent in Vaughan Williams' music.

For all the romantic tingle of the "Spring" Symphony, and for all the gorgeous tone with which it was played, the performance in general seemed very nervous. There were near-mistakes by the horns, and through all four movements the orchestra for some reason seemed to be on edge.—C. W. D.

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA
Symphony Luncheon

Another of the noontime Symphony Luncheons took place in Copley Plaza Hotel yesterday. Boris Goldovsky, the speaker at all of them, gave his attention to two of the works on the current Boston Symphony Orchestra program, Schumann's First Symphony, and "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz.

Only the first two movements of the latter were discussed and illustrated at the piano, and apart from playing certain portions of the Schumann's Symphony, Mr. Goldovsky confined himself to general remarks about that work. C. W. D.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 10 1943

Boston Orchestra Again Superb Under Koussevitzky Direction

Symphony in C major, No. 34 ..... Mozart
Allegro vivace
Andante di molto
Finale: Allegro vivace
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" . Moussorgsky
"Daphnis et Chloe" ballet ..... Ravel
(Orchestra excerpts, second suite)
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse generale
Symphony No. 6 ..... Shostakovich
Largo
Allegro
Presto

Time has wrought many changes since Dr Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra here last. That was two years ago, before the prolonged scrap about joining the union was resolved but the Hub orchestra men have not become musically round shouldered from carrying their union cards. The ensemble is still, if not the greatest American orchestra, at least, the one all others must surpass before they can be acclaimed the greatest. It was a tribute to community concerts and to the orchestra that the Municipal Auditorium was jammed.

There was perfection about everything on the printed program last night after one got over the disappointment of Dr Koussevitzky's lackadaisical direction of the "Star Spangled Banner" which seems to lead Boston conductors into one kind of trouble or another. Directing it like an orchestral selection that has to have variety in the middle section, Dr Koussevitzky envisions the "bombs bursting in air" with all the discreet correctness of some Handel ballet music.

Forgiveness is ready, however, for one who can, in his own field, provide such magnificent readings as those offered last night. It was the same orchestra that Richard Burgin conducted last year when Dr Koussevitzky had just lost his wife, but there was that electricity that surcharges the orchestra when the maestro himself wields the baton. The Mozart had not only the formal perfection that is requisite, but also the life that is often obscured by too scholarly an approach.

The Moussorgsky was, to this reviewer, the best thing of the evening with a pianissimo finale to end all pianissimos, in addition to some ravishing tonal beauty. The Ravel, which has been recorded by the Hub orchestra, is a definitive version, though there were moments, as in the Shostakovitch, that it seemed as though there were fortissimos for their own sake.

The Shostakovitch was being played for the first time here and its advent was eagerly awaited, particularly in view of the fuss made over his Seventh symphony this past year. Like the Mozart it has three movements, but the resemblance ends just about there. The first movement takes more time than the other two combined and the finale sounds like a wicked Soviet parody on the "Overture" to "William Tell."

Unlike his Second, Third and Fifth symphonies which commemorate, respectively, the 10th anniversary of the revolution, May day, and the 20th anniversary of the October revolution in 1937, this has no program. After his smart alecky days, he began to write music that was "new, powerful and intelligible" when the official voice of Soviet music pointed out the error of his ways. In many ways, this is reminiscent of the Fifth in that "his "avant garde" tendencies were subordinated, yet it is "modern" in that it is undeniably a product of our day. How long it will live is for time to tell, though he set his own standard in his First symphony.

There was balloting last night for next season and results will be announced at the next concert, a joint recital by Richard Crooks and Bidu Sayao on March 26.

J. D. D.

This Clipping From
Camden, N. J.
Courier
FEB 5 - 1943

Boston Symphony In Phila. Concert

Koussevitzky Directs Program for Forum Next Wednesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening February 10, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present this unparalleled organization in Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 6, and the Beethoven Fifth.

These annual Boston Symphony visits sponsored by The Philadelphia Forum are unquestionably a very high peak in Philadelphia's musical season.

The Boston Symphony, founded in 1881 by Major Henry Lee Higginson, is now in its sixty-second season. The inception of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is traceable to the realization of a young Bostonian student of music in Vienna that America should have a symphony orchestra of the high standard which one could hear in the old world. Mr. Higginson held tenaciously to his dream for more than twenty years until at last, in 1881, he had acquired sufficient means to make it a fact. Mr. Higginson's principal thought was to create an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price. That was characteristically quiet statement. The word "best" is a short and usually a loose one. When Mr. Higginson used it, he meant exactly what he said.

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky in 1924 to take over the destinies of the orchestra proved a assurance of still further advance the universality of the repertory.

Russian expatriate who had velt in Germany, France and sited England, he had closely entified himself with the musical cultures of each country, and others as well. In the years to follow, America's composers and America's musical point of view became equally familiar to him. His sympathies know no border, nor does he neglect contemporary currents in his preoccupation with the great music of the past. Dr. Koussevitzky has led the Orchestra for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of his previous leader. The way in which he has brought the Orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown is too familiar to need retelling.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
FEB 3 1943

TANGLEWOOD MUSIC CENTER MAY OPERATE

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation may operate the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood as it did in 1942, according to a form letter received by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The trustees are asked if they will consent to the use of the Shed at Tanglewood by the school. The form is returnable to Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival corporation. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, owners of the Tanglewood property, have already given consent for use of the property if Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his associates care to operate the Center this year.

VARIED MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post Feb 6, 1943

Mendelssohn, Debussy, Strauss on Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra by any chance were to go out of existence its remarkable prowess, thanks to the phonograph records, would be much more than a mere legend. These recordings are now numerous and, when Mr. Petrillo settles his present difficulties with the recording companies, there will be more of them, exemplifying the various facets of the skill of the orchestra and its conductor.

But if one wished to pick three out of the lot that would come close to covering the situation, there could speedily be a better choice than Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the three pieces on this week's programme.

As a matter of fact, "Zarathustra" was there by accident. Illness in the ranks prevented the intended revival of Schoenberg's heavily-scored tone poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," which the composer introduced to us in 1934.

Recollection has it that this example of early Schoenbergian late-romanticism was no great shakes, but it would have had the interest of a semi-novelty, and novel music is a bit scarce at Symphony Hall nowadays.

Speaking of revivals, it is about time that we were reminded of another symphony of Mendelssohn, the "Scotch," long unheard here. Granted that the "Italian" is better sustained, of more even worth and interest throughout, the "Scotch" Symphony has its points. That it can be made compellingly eloquent was proved by the recent New York Philharmonic broadcast under Mr. Mitropoulos. With symphonists, except Brahms and Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky is inclined to be arbitrarily selective.

If Debussy's "The Sea," certainly his most characteristic orchestral work, were to drop from the repertory it would be because the extremely personal idiom in which it is couched had palled off itself. If "Zarathustra" should go under, it would be because of the relative weakness of certain sections. Already it is possible to place it far below its immediate successor, the "Don Quixote," which we were hearing a few weeks ago. When he wrote that musical tragi-comedy Strauss looked into his heart. "Zarathustra" comes close to being a compositional tour de force. It still has its glowing and stupendous pages.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 15 1943

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS MOZART

Boston Orchestra Presents a Symphony in C Major at Carnegie Hall Program

SIBELUS SECOND HEARD

Familiar Composition Follows 'Demoiselle Elue' With the Sarah Lawrence Chorus

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was all devoted to accepted masterpieces, beginning with one of the Mozart symphonies in C major — not the "Jupiter" — and ending with the thrilling performance of the Second symphony of Sibelius, and it was proved again, in the most impressive manner, that it is not tricks of style or novelty of harmonization that makes a great piece of music, but rather the spirit of that music, and the authenticity of its inspiration.

The Mozart symphony was the one numbered 338 by Koechel, which will tell the lay reader precisely nothing, but will serve the conductor or the student who wants to find the score with a ready means of identification. More important, and a little surprising, it is, that this symphony dates as late as 1780. For this is not one of the most individual of Mozart's works in the form, and in some respects is quite purely reflective of musical conventions of the period.

First Two Movements

The first two movements of the work heard last night could almost be by Haydn. The gem of the three movements is the lilting, flashing, mercurial finale, which in point of invention, spirit and instrumentation is an exultant flight of the spirit, having no precise parallel in any other symphonic movement by Mozart that we recall.

This for the music. As for the performance, one is moved to remark that it was played with a quality of tone and a winged virtuosity which would have glorified any score—or any score adequately put together and worthy of such sound! Had the symphony been only advanced as a vehicle for the glory of the orchestra it would have justified its presence on the program.

The Debussy "Demoiselle Elue," after Rossetti, performed the preceding afternoon by the same forces, was repeated, and again wrought its simple and exquisite spell. The soloists, Mme. Denya and Miss Tourel, and the chorus of the Sarah Lawrence College collaborated, if any thing, more perfectly and with a more sensitive and exact degree of correspondence between all the expressive elements than at the first performance. Dr. Koussevitzky not only interpreted, he re-created the music. And again one marveled at the perfume of this immature and partially derivative work of Debussy's youth and the imperishable beauty that it exhales.

Familiar Work Played

It was particularly worth while and, as the event proved, very exciting to hear again the familiar symphony of Sibelius; to compare it with his later works in the same form, which have appeared more frequently on New York programs in the last two seasons, and to have a fresh perspective of the music, which stands up magnificently under this examination.

More than ever impressive is the primitive freshness and originality of the writing; the power of its simplicity; the new use to which familiar chords are put; the new conception of instrumental coloring, so singularly evocative of Northern nature, and, above all, the grandeur and heroism of its sprit. There are derivations, influences, such as measures which hint at Tchaikovsky; there are passages of bald simplicity that approach the obvious. And there is nothing untouched with grandeur and pathos, and the sense of a spirit heroically alone, self-communing and, most fortunately, apart from the patent insincerities and affectations, the feebleness and empty pose which, in the field of composition, have especially infested this age.

Of course, the music proved irresistible. Of course, the audience was shouting at the end. Dr. Koussevitzky had expended every iota of his knowledge, his orchestral mastery, his sense of proportion, contrast and climax on this sinewy score, with its flaming apotheosis. We can imagine a more jagged and savage reading, but it would be hard to conceive of one more integrated, one which souught in every measure to perceive the composer's purpose, meet him half way in his problems and illuminate them for all who heard. The evening was one more memorable triumph for the orchestra and its leader. The best musical audience that New York assembled packed the hall.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 14 1943

Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College, led by William H. Schuman, appears with Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

FEB 1

'BLESSED DAMOZEL' TWICE PRESENTED

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Two performances in as many days of Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" lifted the symphonic week end out of the routine that otherwise would have characterized it. This "envoi" of the runaway Prix de Rome winner—for it was written in Paris and not at the Villa Medici—has appeared only rarely on our orchestral or choral programs. Last night's performance, and that of the Saturday afternoon preceding, were not the first given here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, but the intervals between them have been such as to insure for each rehearing the welcome savor of a revival or quasi-novelty.

The chorus for this latest reversion to the 25-year-old Debussy's setting of Sarrazin's French translation of Dante Gabriel Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel" was that of Sarah Lawrence College, which had been prepared by William Schuman. The soloists were Marcelle Denya, who sang the soprano solo of the damozel, and Jennie Tourel, whose part was that of the contralto narrator. The honors were the orchestra's. Though the scoring is not that of the later Debussy—there is little of his characteristic "powdering" of sonorities—it invites playing that is sensitive and full of caress. This it was granted and there was much that was exquisite in its sheen.

The chorus of young women, if in no sense unusual, met its obligations musically and with something of mood. Of the solo voices, Miss Tourel's was much the more gratifying in timbre and production, though Mme. Denya sang with a sincere approach to the style. Whether the work itself has faded is something of individual reaction. This listener found much of it fresh and enchanting last night.

The Sunday program included also Mozart's infrequently heard C major Symphony of 1780 (Koechel No. 338), of which the last movement with its woodwind choirings is something of the clearest genius; and the Sibelius Second Symphony, the interpretation of which happens to be one of Dr. Koussevitzky's unrivaled accomplishments. On Saturday a rather secondary work by Milhaud, "Le Cortege Funebre," was heard in an all-French program along with Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite—another of Bostonians' miracle pieces—and the same composer's "Scheherazade" poems, sung by Mme. Denya.

Stokowski and Barbirolli.

Another revival of yesterday's concerts was Gustav Holst's suite, "The Planets," which has been remembered through a longish period of neglect chiefly by its first section, "Mars, the Bringer of War." Leopold Stokowski devoted his NBC Symphony concert entirely to this work, playing all of its seven movements, in which "Venus, the Bringer of Peace" comes second and thereafter Mercury, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and finally Neptune, the last of these calling for a wordless chorus. The Stokowski performance was an altogether admirable one. Unquestionably well written, particularly as concerns its virtuoso employment of the orchestra, the suite still fails to establish itself as making any very fundamental contribution in a world that has so much more music than can possibly be kept alive.

John Barbirolli's program at Carnegie Hall was the same for Saturday and Sunday. Its best performance was that accorded Franck's only symphony, which has always fared well at his hands. Included also were the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Chasins's "Parade" (composed in 1931 but now dedicated to the defenders of Corregidor), Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and the Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's "Schwanda."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Here

Works of Mozart, Sibelius and Debussy on Program

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338), the Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, of Sibelius and a repetition of Debussy's lyric poem, "La Demoiselle Elue," from the Saturday afternoon concert's program. This last was given with the assistance of the Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College and with Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel as soloists.

It always gives one the keenest pleasure to hear a perfect performance, particularly of a work as lovely as the Mozart Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky presented last night. Even without the masterful phrasing of the melodic line and the orchestra's complete and constant equilibrium, the utter sweetness of the sound in itself ata any given moment was enough to win one's heart.
at any given moment was enough the world of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, however, can scarcely mitigate the antipathy one feels toward a work so basically antimusical. Such a conscientious rendition as was given last night merely emphasized its pretentious conception and the academic fashion in which the composer carried out that conception. Listened to as the accompaniment to a Western film, the second movement, for instance, might be pleasurable; alone it is altogether hateful.

P. B.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

FEB

The Best Band of All Plays in Carnegie Hall

Lucky Strike's Hit Parade pushed the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony from Friday to Sunday. The change apparently had no effect on the magnificent quality of everything this orchestra does. After missing it for two months, I had almost forgotten how well the most wonderful orchestra in the country can sound.

The concert started with the Mozart Symphony No. 34, and the precise, rich work of the strings with their supple response to every nuance indicated by Serge Koussevitzky was once more a revelation of what a string choir can do. This was especially marked in the song-like middle movement.

Then came Debussy's La Damoiselle Elue, sung with sureness and sweet transparency of tone by William Schuman's girls from Sarah Lawrence College. Jennie Tourel sang the contralto solo extremely well, and Marcelle Denya was uneven in the difficult soprano part. But it was the Boston's woodwinds and strings that made the overlong composition shimmer with beauty. One reason may have been that the instruments did not need to cope with the utterly prosaic French translation of Rosetti's beautiful poem.

Finally there was the Second Symphony by Sibelius, built to a stunning climax that sent the audience home with the final themes throbbing in every vein.

The best tunes of all still go to Carnegie Hall. Sundays.—H. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1943

Two Brilliant Concerts by Boston Symphony

Debussy's La Demoiselle Eleu Given at Both Performances

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The glittering perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing came in for another pair of exhibitions over the weekend. And not only that, but there were programs to perform requiring all of that glittering perfection and then some. Both concerts took place in Carnegie Hall, of course.

One of the works offered was common to both events, Debussy's La Demoiselle Elue, which called for the services of Marcelle Denya, soprano; Jennie Tourel, mezzo soprano, and the chorus of the Sarah Lawrence College, William Schuman, director, besides the orchestra. On Saturday afternoon it was companioned by Milhaud's Le Cortege Funebre, and Scheherazade and Daphnis and Chloe by Ravel.

The Bostonians have ever been partial to works by French composers, and their leader, Serge Koussevitzky, has made some of these works his special oysters. Daphnis and Chloe (the second suite was the one performed), for instance, brought out the most amazing virtuosity. It is in music of that type that the musicians play with jewel-mechanism and finish.

* * *

Debussy Alive.

Debussy's Demoiselle Elue, one of his earlier compositions, foreshadows the extraordinary scores that were to come, though it is many parasangs removed from them. The composer, nevertheless, shows in this piece a masterly understanding of writing for the human voice. And his thematic material, while not the equal of that of his later period, is fresh and youthful and always alive.

Mme. Tourel, singing the smaller of the two solo parts, walked off with vocal honors. Again she sang with the utmost ease, showing a deep understanding of the turn of phrase. She is a highly gifted artist not the least of whose gifts is her unerring instinct for the proper tonal colors. Besides, Mme. Tourel's voice was warm and sensuous and entirely musical.

Mme. Denya did her work with obvious sincerity. She, however, did not have the thrust or the musical espirit demonstrated by her colleague. In the Ravel Scheherazade, whose vocal lines can be awfully nasty to the unwary soloist because they are ever in the limelight, she did agreeably enough.

Rosalie Grant, former opera star of Vienna, is now singing at the Essex House Casino-on-the-Park.

Last evening the other items were the Mozart C Major Symphony, No. 34 (K. 338) and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky was at the top of his are in the performance of these works, as well as the Debussy. He gave to Mozart the things that are Mozart's and to the Sibelius the things that are his.

Audiences at both concerts went away satisfied with the music they had heard and with its performance. Two more feathers for the Boston cap, which must, by now, be laden down with them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 1943

Philharmonic Goes Into Sharp Discord Over 17 Firings

Orchestra Itself Threatens Strike Against Rodzinski

The majestic dignity of a symphony orchestra in its musical moments was fast vanishing today in the case of the New York Philharmonic as the latter faced an upheaval over the dismissal of 17 members.

The orchestra, threatening to strike en masse at the expiration of this season's contract, was bitterly assailing its new conductor, Artur Rodzinski, as "completely unstable temperamentally" and given to "arbitrary caprices."

In the face of these accusations, the orchestra's own union was praising Dr. Rodzinski as "just the man" to give the Philharmonic "a soul and a purpose."

Eulogized in Union Paper.

International Musician, official organ of the American Federation of Musicians, in its February issue, carries a page one eulogy and photograph of the new conductor whom the Philharmonic is recruiting from the Cleveland Symphony.

After setting forth his qualifications, the union journal concludes "it is easy to see why the managing board of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra has chosen Dr. Rodzinski as conductor of that group. He perhaps more than any other is capable of creating out of this assembly of virtuosoi an organization superlative as such."

The management, meanwhile, was standing pat in face of the orchestra's charges of slander, lack of imagination, "premeditated and cultivated terrorism" and "fascism."

Traditional Feud Cited.

One spokesman, in an effort to illustrate the troubles that often beset a symphony orchestra management, cited the traditional feud between the oboe player and the flute player. In many orchestras (not the New York), he said, this feud is continuous and here is how it shows up:

During the tuning up, the oboeist always gives the flutist his pitch. But, with Machiavelian foresight, the oboe player sometimes pulls his mouth reed just a little bit out, thus sounding a note that is slightly flat. Then, having started the flutist off key, he quietly pushes the reed back in place and begins, himself, in perfect pitch.

One accusation raised by the orchestra's elected committee of five members is that the management "hysterically" brought in a "bewildering variety" of conductors this season, all of whom trotted out "their pet hobby horses." Thus, they contend, "a half-digested mass" of inadequately rehearsed music "was spread out as a finished product on our New York public."

The Manager's Viewpoint.

Arthur Judson, the Philharmonic's manager, replied: "New York is the one place in America where every conductor wants to bring out the best music he knows. And we intend to keep it so, even though the musicians might prefer to play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony every day in the week."

During the last season the New York music critics have generally been attacking the Philharmonic, partly because of its frequent change of conductors and occasionally on the grounds of poor orchestra playing.

Under Toscanini, and with the same personnel, the committee contends, it was the best orchestra in the world.

The orchestra committee charges to cacrry out what it calls "politithat Mr. Rodzinski was brought in cal" designs on the part of the directors, by which it means an alleged antiunion bias.

Koussevitsky First Choice.

In reply to this, Mr. Judson told the World-Telegram today Sergei Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony was the directors' first choice for next season. Favorably disposed at first, Mr. Koussevitsky later decided to remain with the Boston Symphony after the latter's long-standing dispute with the union was settled.

It proffered the conductorshi to Bruno Walter, who declined be cause of his advancing age, accord ing to Mr. Judson, although offer ing his full co-operation shoul Mr. Rodzinski be appointed.

Musical circles today recalle how even political and religiou issues may become involved in th choice of a conductor. Severa seasons back some of the Phil harmonic directors wanted to brin Furtwaengler over from Germany

Violent Dispute Started.

This precipitated a violent dis pute among the society's director because of Furtwaengler's clos association with the Nazi regim Finally a compromise was reache in John Barbirolli, the young En lish conductor.

As the controversy stands no the orchestra is insisting on an ar tration of all present and futu dismissals, asserting the manag ment's policies are arbitrary a backward. Mr. Judson's stand that the conductor must be giv full power "to build the instr ments the way he wants."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 21 1943

Koussevitzky Scheduled to Play Roy Harris Work

An event of major importance to the music world will take place this week, when the first performance of an American symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, is presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The work, Symphony No. 5 by Roy Harris, will be heard over the Blue network—including WFCI—Saturday night.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra today in a program featuring works by Stravinsky, Debussy and Ravel.

"Ballad for Americans" will be sung by James Melton on the Great Artists series tomorrow night.

Details of these and other serious music programs on the air follow:

TODAY

WJAR—2:30-3:00 p. m. — John Charles Thomas, with Mark Warnow orchestra, Lyn Murray chorus:

Tommy Lad ..... Margetson
Thomas
Tea for Two ..... Youmans
Orchestra
I'm Wearin' Awa ..... Nairne
Thomas
Allouette ..... Traditional
Chorus
Yankee Doodle ..... Shackenburg
Orchestra
Toreador ..... Bizet
Ensemble

WPRO—3:00-4:30 p. m.—N. Y. Philharmonic, John Barbirolli conducting:

Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Symphony in G minor, No. 40 .... Mozart
Second Symphony in D major ... Brahms

WPRO—4:30-5:00 p. m. — Andre Kostelanetz, with Rise Stevens and Albert Spalding.

WPRO—5:00-5:45 p. m. — Family Hour with Mack Harrell, baritone; Deems Taylor and Al Goodman's Orchestra:

WJAR—5:00-6:00 p. m.—NBC Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski:

Symphony ..... Stravinsky
Night in Granada ..... Debussy-Stokowski
Music from Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" ..... Ravel

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 2 1943

BARRELS of beautiful orchestral tone were poured into Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony last week when Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of music by Milhaud, Debussy, and Ravel. The Milhaud "Cortège Funèbre," composed in May, 1940, and reflecting the tragedy of France, was naturally subdued in mood. The rest of the concert, however, was all lyricism and brilliance, and Mr. Koussevitzky just about inundated a receptive gathering with it.

Debussy's "La Damoiselle Élue" is early Debussy, and you can catch a few Wagnerian impressions as it goes by. Still, it is mostly straight Debussy, and it is music to hear and enjoy without bothering much about the implications of the symbolist movement and the rest of the history behind the piece. You don't even have to read the Rossetti "Blessed Damozel," of which the French text is a translation. There was excellent coöperation from the Sarah Lawrence College Chorus and from the soloists, Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel.

Ravel's "Schéhérazade," settings of a trio of poems by Tristan Klingsor (né Tristan Leclère), isn't top Ravel, but the ingenious orientalism in the orchestra is good listening, especially when it gets the handling Mr. Koussevitzky supplied. Miss Denya's singing of the text was understanding and artistic in spite of variable vocalization. For tops in tone, there was Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloé" suite, a Koussevitzky de-luxer.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 19 1943

Orchestra Plans Red Army Salute

BOSTON—In the Boston Symphony concerts Feb. 26 and 27, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a first performance of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 5, written to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Red Army. The first four symphonies of the Oklahoma-born composer have been introduced by Koussevitzky.

Harris has dedicated his Fifth to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 943

Harris Symphony Premiere

ITHACA, N. Y., Feb. 19 (AP).—The fifth symphony of Dr. Roy Harris, composer in residence at Cornel' University, will receive its world premiere Feb. 26 in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It will be broadcast from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., Feb. 27, over the Blue Network, and will be short-waved to Russia as a tribute to the Soviet Army's twenty-fifth anniversary, and will be recorded by the Office of War

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

American Symphony Will Honor Russians

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—An American symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, will be presented for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on February 27. Playing of the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red Army. The broadcast will be heard from 8:15 to 9:15 p.m. (E.W.T.) on the Blue Network.

Jean Lefranc Soloist In Berlioz Symphony

Feb 20 1943
Christian Science Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

Another program of familiar works made up the list for yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the first of the sixteenth pair of the season. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for double string orchestra; Schumann's Symphony in B flat, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," with Jean Lefranc playing the solo viola part.

The Vaughan Williams and the Berlioz works had both been played within the last year, and although both are interesting in their so different ways there is some question whether they rate performance so soon again. The Schumann was last heard in Symphony Hall in October, 1939; so it might reasonably be argued that it was due for revival, even a little in advance of spring.

There was brilliant playing yesterday, deeply emotional playing, charmingly romantic playing, dramatic and even theatrical playing. The theatrical effects come in the Berlioz, where they belonged, and in the Schumann, where they did not belong. Dr. Koussevitzky again permitted himself exaggerations and distorations which concealed instead of revealing the romantic heart of the score. The Symphony in B flat is not the greatest music ever penned, but if it is agreed that it requires an occasional hearing, it should be played as is, and not dressed up.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is one of his finest compositions, and it seems to be for Dr. Koussevitzky the most accessible of all the works of a composer with whom the conductor is apparently not in deep sympathy. It was played yesterday with notable beauty of tone, and with a profound devotional feeling.

Of the Berlioz symphony, again, it may be said that it is one of its composer's most successful creations, interesting not only for historical reasons, but in itself for its forthright songfulness, its unashamed sentimentality. French sentimentality is always less objectionable than German, probably because the French do not wallow in it. However exaggerated their emotional expression may seem at the moment, one always feels that pretty soon they are going to bow and retire into the wings.

M. Lefranc, who was heard here for the first time in this music, gave a distinguished performance, with a rich, broad tune, and sensitive musicianship. The orchestral performance set forth eloquently the qualities of the score.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 15 1943

Two Brilliant Concerts by Boston Symphony

Debussy's La Demoiselle Eleu Given at Both Performances

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The glittering perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing came in for another pair of exhibitions over the weekend. And not only that, but there were programs to perform requiring all of that glittering perfection and then some. Both concerts took place in Carnegie Hall, of course.

One of the works offered was common to both events, Debussy's La Demoiselle Elue, which called for the services of Marcelle Denya, soprano; Jennie Tourel, mezzo soprano, and the chorus of the Sarah Lawrence College, William Schuman, director, besides the orchestra. On Saturday afternoon it was companioned by Milhaud's Le Cortege Funebre, and Schehera-zade and Daphnis and Chloe by Ravel.

The Bostonians have ever been partial to works by French composers, and their leader, Serge Koussevitzky, has made some of these works his special oysters. Daphnis and Chloe (the second suite was the one performed), for instance, brought out the most amazing virtuosity. It is in music of that type that the musicians play with jewel-mechanism and finish.

* * *

Debussy Alive.

Debussy's Demoiselle Elue, one of his earlier compositions, foreshadows the extraordinary scores that were to come, though it is many parasangs removed from them. The composer, nevertheless, shows in this piece a masterly understanding of writing for the human voice. And his thematic material, while not the equal of that of his later period, is fresh and youthful and always alive.

Mme. Tourel, singing the smaller of the two solo parts, walked off with vocal honors. Again she sang with the utmost ease, showing a deep understanding of the turn of phrase. She is a highly gifted artist not the least of whose gifts is her unerring instinct for the proper tonal colors. Besides, Mme. Tourel's voice was warm and sensuous and entirely musical.

Mme. Denya did her work with obvious sincerity. She, however, did not have the thrust or the musical espirit demonstrated by her colleague. In the Ravel Scheherazade, whose vocal lines can be awfully nasty to the unwary soloist because they are ever in the limelight, she did agreeably enough.

Last evening the other items were the Mozart C Major Symphony, No. 34 (K. 338) and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky was at the top of his are in the performance of these works, as well as the Debussy. He gave to Mozart the things that are Mozart's and to the Sibelius the things that are his.

Audiences at both concerts went away satisfied with the music they had heard and with its performance. Two more feathers for the Boston cap, which must, by now, be laden down with them.

Rosalie Grant, former opera star of Vienna, is now singing at the Essex House Casino-on-the-Park.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 20 1943

Philharmonic Goes Into Sharp Discord Over 17 Firings

Orchestra Itself Threatens Strike Against Rodzinski

The majestic dignity of a symphony orchestra in its musical moments was fast vanishing today in the case of the New York Philharmonic as the latter faced an upheaval over the dismissal of 17 members.

The orchestra, threatening to strike en masse at the expiration of this season's contract, was bitterly assailing its new conductor, Artur Rodzinski, as "completely unstable temperamentally" and given to "arbitrary caprices."

In the face of these accusations, the orchestra's own union was praising Dr. Rodzinski as "just the man" to give the Philharmonic "a soul and a purpose."

Eulogized in Union Paper.

International Musician, official organ of the American Federation of Musicians, in its February issue, carries a page one eulogy and photograph of the new conductor whom the Philharmonic is recruiting from the Cleveland Symphony.

After setting forth his qualifications, the union journal concludes "it is easy to see why the managing board of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra has chosen Dr. Rodzinski as conductor of that group. He perhaps more than any other is capable of creating out of this assembly of virtuosoi an organization superlative as such."

The management, meanwhile, was standing pat in face of the orchestra's charges of slander, lack of imagination, "premeditated and cultivated terrorism" and "fascism."

Traditional Feud Cited.

One spokesman, in an effort to illustrate the troubles that often beset a symphony orchestra management, cited the traditional feud between the oboe player and the flute player. In many orchestras (not the New York), he said, this feud is continuous and here is how it shows up:

During the tuning up, the oboeist always gives the flutist his pitch. But, with Machiavelian foresight, the oboe player sometimes pulls his mouth reed just a little bit out, thus sounding a note that is slightly flat. Then, having started the flutist off key, he quietly pushes the reed back in place and begins, himself, in perfect pitch.

One accusation raised by the orchestra's elected committee of five members is that the management "hysterically" brought in a "bewildering variety" of conductors this season, all of whom trotted out "their pet hobby horses." Thus, they contend, "a half-digested mass" of inadequately rehearsed music "was spread out as a finished product on our New York public."

The Manager's Viewpoint.

Arthur Judson, the Philharmonic's manager, replied: "New York is the one place in America where every conductor wants to bring out the best music he knows. And we intend to keep it so, even though the musicians might prefer to play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony every day in the week."

During the last season the New York music critics have generally been attacking the Philharmonic, partly because of its frequent change of conductors and occasionally on the grounds of poor orchestra playing.

Under Toscanini, and with the same personnel, the committee contends, it was the best orchestra in the world.

The orchestra committee charges to carry out what it calls "politithat Mr. Rodzinski was brought in cal" designs on the part of the directors, by which it means an alleged antiunion bias.

Koussevitsky First Choice.

In reply to this, Mr. Judson told the World-Telegram today Sergei Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony was the directors' first choice for next season. Favorably disposed at first, Mr. Koussevitsky later decided to remain with the Boston Symphony after the latter's long-standing dispute with the union was settled.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 21 1943

Koussevitzky Scheduled to Play Roy Harris Work

An event of major importance to the music world will take place this week, when the first performance of an American symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, is presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The work, Symphony No. 5 by Roy Harris, will be heard over the Blue network—including WFCI—Saturday night.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra today in a program featuring works by Stravinsky, Debussy and Ravel.

"Ballad for Americans" will be sung by James Melton on the Great Artists series tomorrow night.

Details of these and other serious music programs on the air follow:

TODAY

WJAR—2:30-3:00 p. m. — John Charles Thomas, with Mark Warnow orchestra, Lyn Murray chorus:

Tommy Lad ..... Margetson
Thomas
Tea for Two ..... Youmans
Orchestra
I'm Wearin' Awa ..... Nairne
Thomas
Allouette ..... Traditional
Chorus
Yankee Doodle ..... Shackenburg
Orchestra
Torreador ..... Bizet
Ensemble

WPRO—3:00-4:30 p. m.—N. Y. Philharmonic, John Barbirolli conducting:

Prelude to 'Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Symphony in G minor, No. 40 .... Mozart
Second Symphony in D major .... Brahms

WPRO—4:30-5:00 p. m. — Andre Kostelanetz, with Rise Stevens and Albert Spalding.

WPRO—5:00-5:45 p. m. — Family Hour with Mack Harrell, baritone; Deems Taylor and Al Goodman's Orchestra:

WJAR—5:00-6:00 p. m.—NBC Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski:

Symphony ..... Strayinsky
Night in Granada ..... Debussy-Stokowski
Music from Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" ..... Ravel

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 20 1943

BARRELS of beautiful orchestral tone were poured into Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony last week when Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of music by Milhaud, Debussy, and Ravel. The Milhaud "Cortège Funèbre," composed in May, 1940, and reflecting the tragedy of France, was naturally subdued in mood. The rest of the concert, however, was all lyricism and brilliance, and Mr. Koussevitzky just about inundated a receptive gathering with it.

Debussy's "La Damoiselle Élue" is early Debussy, and you can catch a few Wagnerian impressions as it goes by. Still, it is mostly straight Debussy, and it is music to hear and enjoy without bothering much about the implications of the symbolist movement and the rest of the history behind the piece. You don't even have to read the Rossetti "Blessed Damozel," of which the French text is a translation. There was excellent coöperation from the Sarah Lawrence College Chorus and from the soloists, Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel.

Ravel's "Schéhérazade," settings of a trio of poems by Tristan Klingsor (né Tristan Leclère), isn't top Ravel, but the ingenious orientalism in the orchestra is good listening, especially when it gets the handling Mr. Koussevitzky supplied. Miss Denya's singing of the text was understanding and artistic in spite of variable vocalization. For tops in tone, there was Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloé" suite, a Koussevitzky de-luxer.

This Clipping
PITTSFIELD
BERKSHIRE
FEB 19 1943

Orchestra Plans Red Army Salute

BOSTON—In the Boston Symphony concerts Feb. 26 and 27, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct a performance of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 5, written to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Army. The first four symphonies of the Oklahoma-born composer have been introduced by Koussevitzky.

Harris has dedicated his Fifth to the epic and freedom-loving people and their great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It proffered the conductorship to Bruno Walter, who declined because of his advancing age, according to Mr. Judson, although offering his full co-operation should Mr. Rodzinski be appointed.

Musical circles today recalled how even political and religious issues may become involved in the choice of a conductor. Several seasons back some of the Philharmonic directors wanted to bring Furtwaengler over from Germany.

Violent Dispute Started.

This precipitated a violent dispute among the society's directors because of Furtwaengler's close association with the Nazi regime. Finally a compromise was reached in John Barbirolli, the young English conductor.

As the controversy stands now, the orchestra is insisting on arbitration of all present and future dismissals, asserting the management's policies are arbitrary and backward. Mr. Judson's stand is that the conductor must be given full power "to build the instruments the way he wants."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1943

Harris Symphony Premiere

ITHACA, N. Y., Feb. 19 (AP).—The fifth symphony of Dr. Roy Harris, composer in residence at Cornel' University, will receive its world premiere Feb. 26 in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It will be broadcast from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., Feb. 27, over the Blue Network, and will be short-waved to Russia as a tribute to the Soviet Army's twenty-fifth anniversary, and will be recorded by the Office of War Information.

NGTON, D. C.
ES HERALD
FEB 19 1943

ican Symphony Honor Russians

ON, Feb. 16.—An Amerphony, dedicated to the hople of the Soviet Union, resented for the first time Boston Symphony Orchesusical by Dr. Serge Kouson February 27. Playork, "Symphony No. 5," Harris, will celebrate the fifth anniversary of the my. The broadcast will be from 8:15 p.m.

Jean Lefranc Soloist In Berlioz Symphony

Feb 20 1943
Christian Science Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

Another program of familiar works made up the list for yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the first of the sixteenth pair of the season. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for double string orchestra; Schumann's Symphony in B flat, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," with Jean Lefranc playing the solo viola part.

The Vaughan Williams and the Berlioz works had both been played within the last year, and although both are interesting in their so different ways there is some question whether they rate performance so soon again. The Schumann was last heard in Symphony Hall in October, 1939; so it might reasonably be argued that it was due for revival, even a little in advance of spring.

There was brilliant playing yesterday, deeply emotional playing, charmingly romantic playing, dramatic and even theatrical playing. The theatrical effects come in the Berlioz, where they belonged, and in the Schumann, where they did not belong. Dr. Koussevitzky again permitted himself exaggerations and distorations which concealed instead of revealing the romantic heart of the score. The Symphony in B flat is not the greatest music ever penned, but if it is agreed that it requires an occasional hearing, it should be played as is, and not dressed up.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is one of his finest compositions, and it seems to be for Dr. Koussevitzky the most accessible of all the works of a composer with whom the conductor is apparently not in deep sympathy. It was played yesterday with notable beauty of tone, and with a profound devotional feeling.

Of the Berlioz symphony, again, it may be said that it is one of its composer's most successful creations, interesting not only for historical reasons, but in itself for its forthright songfulness, its unashamed sentimentality. French sentimentality is always less objectionable than German, probably because the French do not wallow in it. However exaggerated their emotional expression may seem at the moment, one always feels that pretty soon they are going to bow and retire into the wings.

M. Lefranc, who was heard here for the first time in this music, gave a distinguished performance, with a rich, broad tone, and sensitive musicianship. The orchestral performance set forth eloquently the qualities of the score.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Superb in Concert of Reprise

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1943

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Here

Works of Mozart, Sibelius and Debussy on Program

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night in its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338), the Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, of Sibelius and a repetition of Debussy's lyric poem, "La Demoiselle Elue," from the Saturday afternoon concert's program. This last was given with the assistance of the Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College and with Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel as soloists.

It always gives one the keenest pleasure to hear a perfect performance, particularly of a work as lovely as the Mozart Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky presented Sunday night. Even without the masterful phrasing of the melodic line and the orchestra's complete and constant equilibrium, the utter sweetness of the sound in itself at any given moment was enough to win one's heart.

Even the finest performance in the world of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, however, can scarcely mitigate the antipathy one feels toward a work so basically antimusical. Such a conscientious rendition as was given Sunday night merely emphasized its pretentious conception and the academic fashion in which the composer carried out that conception. Listened to as the accompaniment to a Western film, the second movement, for instance, might be pleasurable; alone it is altogether hateful.

P. B.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

FEB

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER

FEB 21 1943

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN

Boston Symphony to Play New Work by Roy Harris

An event of major importance to the music world will take place on Saturday, Feb. 27, when the first performance of an American symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, is presented exclusively over the Blue networks by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the red army of the Soviet Union, the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will be heard from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. (C.W.T.), and in the Latin American countries via seven shortwave stations.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

FEB 21

Symphony for Russians Played by the Bostons

An event of importance to the music world will take place next Saturday when the first performance of an American symphony dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union is presented over the Blue network by the Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red army, the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will be heard from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. (WCFL, WEMP) and in the Latin American countries via seven short wave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell university. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

Feb 20 '43 Herald

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jean Lefranc, first violist of the orchestra, was soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program was as follows:

Variations on a Theme of Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
Harold in Italy," Op. 16 ..... Berlioz

Since this is evidently to be the season of reprises of recent successes in the programs of the Boston Symphony, let us hope that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to revive such fine things as the program contained yesterday. It was a superb concert in every detail, and never, surely, has the orchestra performed with such consistent magnificence.

From the beginning of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, it was evident that conductor and orchestra were in peak form. While its technical assurance was, as always, beyond compare, there was an added sheen and luster to the tonal quality of the full string band. Surely, there was never heard so beautiful a sound as that produced by the muted strings of the nonet, nor so perfectly wrought a balance among the three contrasted groups of strings.

As John Burk quotes Eric Blom in his program annotations (the quality of which are as much in a class by themselves as the orchestra itself, by the way), the Fantasia is to be heard as a modern composition. That Williams has captured both the form and the antique flavor of the harmonic progression, doesn't alter the strictly modern technique he employs. The result is a work of profound beauty which grows in stature on every hearing.

Of Schumann's four symphonies, the "Spring" symphony appears to be Dr. Koussevitzky's—and Boston's—favorite. Of the four, it certainly makes the most sense, orchestrally speaking for, as is constantly repeated, Schumann was not at his happiest in the medium. No one but he would have ever thought to give the oboe so clumsy a passage as that in the finale! Yet the music is extraordinarily beautiful all the way through, and Dr. Koussevitzky, better than anyone else, endows it with continuity and unity, drawing from it, moreover, all the romantic glow of its moods and fancies.

On second hearing, "Harold in Italy" remains as enchanting—if not quite so impressive—as it did on first contact last spring. The first two movements are especially delectable and evocative, while the constant appearance of the minor interval in the cadences of the "March of the Pilgrims" remains one of the most superb illustrations of Berlioz' originality. True, the whole work has lapses of taste, but far better to have them than lapses of inspiration! Jean Lefranc, the principal violist of the orchestra, performed the solo part admirably, achieving great beauty of tone color. His playing might have had more vigor, and the arpeggios played near the bridge of the instrument might have been more clearly articulated, but it was generally a most gratifying solo performance. As has be frequently stated, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play Berlioz with incredible sensitivity and virtuosity. Yesterday's performance by no means diminished their reputation. Next week's program consists of Hill's B-flat major Symphony, Harris' Fifth Symphony and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist.

'SPRING' MOOD FOR SYMPHONY

Works by Schumann, Berlioz, Williams Played

Post Feb 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A touch of spring in the air gave appropriateness to the performance at yesterday's Symphony Concert of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony (his First in B-flat major) and to the romantic ardors of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with which the programme concluded.

Less seasonal, or rather unseasonal because of the cathedral-like atmosphere, was the first number. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The viola soloist in "Harold" was Jean Lefranc, first violinist of the orchestra.

With Berlioz' extraordinary work Dr. Koussevitzky is making up for lost time. Until last April, when he revived it for Louis Bailly, who had come to play a Viola Concerto by Berezowsky, the Symphony had gone unheard here since 1919. In matters of orchestration Berlioz was not merely years but decades ahead of his time. His musical thought was also prophetic. There is a freedom and plasticity in his tonal speech that is far removed from the measured periods of the classicists and Berlioz' fellow romanticists. It is hard to believe on the evidence of the scores themselves that "Harold in Italy" was composed in 1834 and Schumann's First in 1841.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantistique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 23 1943

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 23

Red Forces Hailed By Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Feb. 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and Fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. * * * "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

CONCERT AND OPERA

Roy Harris Dedicates Fifth Symphony to Soviets—Premiere in Boston

ROY HARRIS has dedicated his new Fifth symphony to The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics "as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

As a further Soviet link for the symphony, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the première of the work next Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army.

Describing the new symphony, Mr. Harris writes that he hoped in it to express qualities of the American people which our popular dance music, by its very nature, cannot reveal. "Our people are more than pleasure-loving," Mr. Harris said. "We also have qualities of heroic strength, determination, will to struggle, faith in our destiny."

The symphony is in three movements. It will take about thirty minutes to play.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB

Serge Koussevitzky Congratulates Reds

Boston, Feb. 23.—(AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. . . . "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Superb in Concert of Reprise

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 16 1943

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Here

Works of Mozart, Sibelius and Debussy on Program

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night in its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338), the Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, of Sibelius and a repetition of Debussy's lyric poem, "La Demoiselle Elue," from the Saturday afternoon concert's program. This last was given with the assistance of the Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College and with Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel as soloists.

It always gives one the keenest pleasure to hear a perfect performance, particularly of a work as lovely as the Mozart Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky presented Sunday night. Even without the masterful phrasing of the melodic line and the orchestra's complete and constant equilibrium, the utter sweetness of the sound in itself at any given moment was enough to win one's heart.

Even the finest performance in the world of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, however, can scarcely mitigate the antipathy one feels toward a work so basically antimusical. Such a conscientious rendition as was given Sunday night merely emphasized its pretentious conception and the academic fashion in which the composer carried out that conception. Listened to as the accompaniment to a Western film, the second movement, for instance, might be pleasurable; alone it is altogeth[er] hateful.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
FEB

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
FEB 21 1943

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
FEB

[P]remiere pe[rformance] of Fifth S[ymphony] dedicat[ed] to the Russian pe[ople] played t[oday] to celebrate the [twenty-fifth] anniversary of the Red army of the Soviet Union, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted the premiere performances of all the other Harris symphonies. He will complete the Saturday program with Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony No. 1 in B-Flat Major, Op. 34.

(This program will be broadcast on KGKO at 7:15 p.m. Saturday.)

David K. Blake, electrical engineer of Schenectady, N. Y., will address the Texas chapter of the American Institute of [illegible]

[illegible]ons

An event of importance to [illegible] music world will take place next Saturday when the first performance of an American symphony dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union is presented over the Blue network by the Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red army, the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will be heard from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. (WCFL, WEMP) and in the Latin American countries via seven short wave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell university. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

Feb 20 '43 Herald

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jean Lefranc, first violist of the orchestra, was soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program was as follows:

Variations on a Theme of Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
"Harold in Italy," Op. 16 ..... Berlioz

Since this is evidently to be the season of reprises of recent successes in the programs of the Boston Symphony, let us hope that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to revive such fine things as the program contained yesterday. It was a superb concert in every detail, and never, surely, has the orchestra performed with such consistent magnificence.

From the beginning of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, it was evident that conductor and orchestra were in peak form. While its technical assurance was, as always, beyond compare, there was an added sheen and luster to the tonal quality of the full string band. Surely, there was never heard so beautiful a sound as that produced by the muted strings of the nonet, nor so perfectly wrought a balance among the three contrasted groups of strings.

As John Burk quotes Eric Blom in his program annotations (the quality of which are as much in a class by themselves as the orchestra itself, by the way), the Fantasia is to be heard as a modern composition. That Williams has captured both the form and the antique flavor of the harmonic progression, doesn't alter the strictly modern technique he employs. The result is a work of profound beauty which grows in stature on every hearing.

Of Schumann's four symphonies, the "Spring" symphony appears to be Dr. Koussevitzky's—and Boston's—favorite. Of the four, it certainly makes the most sense, orchestrally speaking for, as is constantly repeated, Schumann was not at his happiest in the medium. No one but he would have ever thought to give the oboe so clumsy a passage as that in the finale! Yet the music is extraordinarily beautiful all the way through, and Dr. Koussevitzky, better than anyone else, endows it with continuity and unity, drawing from it, moreover, all the romantic glow of its moods and fancies.

On second hearing, "Harold in Italy" remains as enchanting—if not quite so impressive—as it did on first contact last spring. The first two movements are especially delectable and evocative, while the constant appearance of the minor interval in the cadences of the "March of the Pilgrims" remains one of the most superb illustrations of Berlioz' originality. True, the whole work has lapses of taste, but far better to have them than lapses of inspiration! Jean Lefranc, the principal violist of the orchestra, performed the solo part admirably, achieving great beauty of tone color. His playing might have had more vigor, and the arpeggios played near the bridge of the instrument might have been more clearly articulated, but it was generally a most gratifying solo performance. As has be[en] frequently stated, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play Berlioz with incredible sensitivity and virtuosity. Yesterday's performance by no means diminished their reputation. Next week's program consists of Hill's B-flat major Symphony, Harris' Fifth Symphony and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist.

'SPRING' MOOD FOR SYMPHONY

Works by Schumann, Berlioz, Williams Played

Post Feb 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A touch of spring in the air gave appropriateness to the performance at yesterday's Symphony Concert of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony (his First in B-flat major) and to the romantic ardors of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with which the programme concluded.

Less seasonal, or rather unseasonal because of the cathedral-like atmosphere, was the first number. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The viola soloist in "Harold" was Jean Lefranc, first violinist of the orchestra.

With Berlioz' extraordinary work Dr. Koussevitzky is making up for lost time. Until last April, when he revived it for Louis Bailly, who had come to play a Viola Concerto by Berezowsky, the Symphony had gone unheard here since 1919. In matters of orchestration Berlioz was not merely years but decades ahead of his time. His musical thought was also prophetic. There is a freedom and plasticity in his tonal speech that is far removed from the measured periods of the classicists and Berlioz' fellow romanticists. It is hard to believe on the evidence of the scores themselves that "Harold in Italy" was composed in 1834 and Schumann's First in 1841.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantistique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 23 1943

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
FEB 23 [illegible]

Red Forces Hailed By Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Feb. 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and Fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. * * * "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 21 1943

CONCERT AND OPERA

Roy Harris Dedicates Fifth Symphony to Soviets—Premiere in Boston

ROY HARRIS has dedicated his new Fifth symphony to The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics "as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

As a further Soviet link for the symphony, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the première of the work next Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army.

Describing the new symphony, Mr. Harris writes that he hoped in it to express qualities of the American people which our popular dance music, by its very nature, cannot reveal. "Our people are more than pleasure-loving," Mr. Harris said. "We also have qualities of heroic strength, determination, will to struggle, faith in our destiny."

The symphony is in three movements. It will take about thirty minutes to play.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 2[illegible]

Serge Koussevitzky Congratulates Reds

Boston, Feb. 23.—(AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. . . . "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Superb in Concert of Reprise

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1943

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Here

Works of Mozart, Sibelius and Debussy on Program

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night in its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338), the Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, of Sibelius and a repetition of Debussy's lyric poem, "La Demoiselle Elue," from the Saturday afternoon concert's program. This last was given with the assistance of the Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College and with Marcene Denya and Jennie Tourel as soloists.

It always gives one the keenest pleasure to hear a perfect performance, particularly of a work as lovely as the Mozart Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky presented Sunday night. Even without the masterful phrasing of the melodic line and the orchestra's complete and constant equilibrium, the utter sweetness of the sound in itself at any given moment was enough to win one's heart.

Even the finest performance in the world of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, however, can scarcely mitigate the antipathy one feels toward a work so basically anti-musical. Such a conscientious rendition as was given Sunday night merely emphasized its pretentious conception and the academic fashion in which the composer carried out that conception. Listened to as the accompaniment to a Western film, the second movement, for instance, might be pleasurable; alone it is altogeth[er] hateful.

Feb 20 '43 Herald

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jean Lefranc, first violist of the orchestra, was soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program was as follows:

Variations on a Theme of Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
"Harold in Italy," Op. 16 ..... Berlioz

Since this is evidently to be the season of reprises of recent successes in the programs of the Boston Symphony, let us hope that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to revive such fine things as the program contained yesterday. It was a superb concert in every detail, and never, surely, has the orchestra performed with such consistent magnificence.

From the beginning of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, it was evident that conductor and orchestra were in peak form. While its technical assurance was, as always, beyond compare, there was an added sheen and luster to the tonal quality of the full string band. Surely, there was never heard so beautiful a sound as that produced by the muted strings of the nonet, nor so perfectly wrought a balance among the three contrasted groups of strings.

As John Burk quotes Eric Blom in his program annotations (the quality of which are as much in a class by themselves as the orchestra itself, by the way), the Fantasia is to be heard as a modern composition. That Williams has captured both the form and the antique flavor of the harmonic progression, doesn't alter the strictly modern technique he employs. The result is a work of profound beauty which grows in stature on every hearing.

Of Schumann's four symphonies, the "Spring" symphony appears to be Dr. Koussevitzky's—and Boston's—favorite. Of the four, it certainly makes the most sense, orchestrally speaking for, as is constantly repeated, Schumann was not at his happiest in the medium. No one but he would have ever thought to give the oboe so clumsy a passage as that in the finale! Yet the music is extraordinarily beautiful all the way through, and Dr. Koussevitzky, better than anyone else, endows it with continuity and unity, drawing from it, moreover, all the romantic glow of its moods and fancies.

On second hearing, "Harold in Italy" remains as enchanting—if not quite so impressive—as it did on first contact last spring. The first two movements are especially delectable and evocative, while the constant appearance of the minor interval in the cadences of the "March of the Pilgrims" remains one of the most superb illustrations of Berlioz' originality. True, the whole work has lapses of taste, but far better to have them than lapses of inspiration! Jean Lefranc, the principal violist of the orchestra, performed the solo part admirably, achieving great beauty of tone color. His playing might have had more vigor, and the arpeggios played near the bridge of the instrument might have been more clearly articulated, but it was generally a most gratifying solo performance. As has be[en] frequently stated, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play Berlioz with incredible sensitivity and virtuosity. Yesterday's performance by no means diminished their reputation. Next week's program consists of Hill's B-flat major Symphony, Harris' Fifth Symphony and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist.

'SPRING' MOOD FOR SYMPHONY

Works by Schumann, Berlioz, Williams Played

Post Feb 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A touch of spring in the air gave appropriateness to the performance at yesterday's Symphony Concert of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony (his First in B-flat major) and to the romantic ardors of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with which the programme concluded.

Less seasonal, or rather unseasonal because of the cathedral-like atmosphere, was the first number. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The viola soloist in "Harold" was Jean Lefranc, first violinist of the orchestra.

With Berlioz' extraordinary work Dr. Koussevitzky is making up for lost time. Until last April, when he revived it for Louis Bailly, who had come to play a Viola Concerto by Berezowsky, the Symphony had gone unheard here since 1919. In matters of orchestration Berlioz was not merely years but decades ahead of his time. His musical thought was also prophetic. There is a freedom and plasticity in his tonal speech that is far removed from the measured periods of the classicists and Berlioz' fellow romanticists. It is hard to believe on the evidence of the scores themselves that "Harold in Italy" was composed in 1834 and Schumann's First in 1841.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantistique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

Westinghou[se]
TONA[Y]
NO

phony of Dr. Roy Harris, composer in residence at Cornell university, will receive its world premiere Feb. 26 in Boston by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky.

It will be broadcast Feb. 27, from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m. ewt, over NBC's blue network, will be short-waved to Russia as a tribute to the Soviet army's 25th anniversary, and will be recorded by the Office of War Information.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 23 1943

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 23 1943

Red Forces Hailed By Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Feb. 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and Fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. * * * "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 21 1943

CONCERT AND OPERA

Roy Harris Dedicates Fifth Symphony to Soviets—Premiere in Boston

ROY HARRIS has dedicated his new Fifth symphony to The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics "as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

As a further Soviet link for the symphony, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the première of the work next Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army.

Describing the new symphony, Mr. Harris writes that he hoped in it to express qualities of the American people which our popular dance music, by its very nature, cannot reveal. "Our people are more than pleasure-loving," Mr. Harris said. "We also have qualities of heroic strength, determination, will to struggle, faith in our destiny."

The symphony is in three movements. It will take about thirty minutes to play.

David K. Blake, electrical [engi]neer of Schenectady, N. Y., will address the Texas chapter of the American Institute of [Ele]ctrical

[Ko]ns

An event of importance to [the] music world will take place next Saturday when the first performance of an American symphony dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union is presented over the Blue network by the Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red army, the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will be heard from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. (WCFL, WEMP) and in the Latin American countries via seven short wave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell university. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 2[1] 1943

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 2[1] 1943

Serge Koussevitzky Congratulates Reds

Boston, Feb. 23.—(AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. . . . "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Superb in Concert of Reprise

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 1 6 1943

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Here

Works of Mozart, Sibelius and Debussy on Program

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night in its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338), the Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, of Sibelius and a repetition of Debussy's lyric poem, "La Demoiselle Elue," from the Saturday afternoon concert's program. This last was given with the assistance of the Chorus of Sarah Lawrence College and with Marcelle Denya and Jennie Tourel as soloists.

It always gi[ves] pleasure to h[ear] formance, par[ticularly] as lovely as th[at] Dr. Koussevitz[ky] night. Even w[ith] phrasing of [the] the orche[stra] constant e[xcellence] sweetness [and] at any give[n] to win one's

Even the [music] the world o[f] of Sibelius, [which] mitiga[tes] toward a work so basically anti-musical. Such a conscientious rendition as was given Sunday night merely emphasized its pretentious conception and the academic fashion in which the composer carried out that conception. Listened to as the accompaniment to a Western film, the second movement, for instance, might be pleasurable; alone it is altogeth[er] hateful.

TODAY
Westinghou
Please Send A
and give it to your carrier bo Yorker Office.
25c Weekly — Sunday ... 10

American symphony, dedicated to the people of the soviet union, will be presented for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on February 27.

Feb 20 43 Herald

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jean Lefranc, first violist of the orchestra, was soloist in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program was as follows:

Variations on a Theme of Thomas Tallis ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
"Harold in Italy," Op. 16 ..... Berlioz

Since this is evidently to be the season of reprises of recent successes in the programs of the Boston Symphony, let us hope that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to revive such fine things as the program contained yesterday. It was a superb concert in every detail, and never, surely, has the orchestra performed with such consistent magnificence.

From the beginning of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, it was evident that conductor and orchestra were in peak form. While its technical assurance was, as always, beyond compare, there was an added sheen and luster to the tonal quality of the full string band. Surely, there was never heard so beautiful a sound as that produced by the muted strings of the nonet, nor so perfectly wrought a balance among the three contrasted groups of strings.

As John Burk quotes Eric Blom in his program annotations (the quality of which are as much in a class by themselves as the orchestra itself, by the way), the Fantasia is to be heard as a modern composition. That Williams has captured both the form and the antique flavor of the harmonic progression, doesn't alter the strictly modern technique he employs. The result is a work of profound beauty which grows in stature on every hearing.

Of Schumann's four symphonies, the "Spring" symphony appears to be Dr. Koussevitzky's—and Boston's—favorite. Of the four, it certainly makes the most sense, orchestrally speaking for, as is constantly repeated, Schumann was not at his happiest in the medium. No one but he would have ever thought to give the oboe so clumsy a passage as that in the finale! Yet the music is extraordinarily beautiful all the way through, and Dr. Koussevitzky, better than anyone else, endows it with continuity and unity, drawing from it, moreover, all the romantic glow of its moods and fancies.

On second hearing, "Harold in Italy" remains as enchanting—if not quite so impressive—as it did on first contact last spring. The first two movements are especially delectable and evocative, while the constant appearance of the minor interval in the cadences of the "March of the Pilgrims" remains one of the most superb illustrations of Berlioz' originality. True, the whole work has lapses of taste, but far better to have them than lapses of inspiration! Jean Lefranc, the principal violist of the orchestra, performed the solo part admirably, achieving great beauty of tone color. His playing might have had more vigor, and the arpeggios played near the bridge of the instrument might have been more clearly articulated, but it was generally a most gratifying solo performance. As has been frequently stated, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play Berlioz with incredible sensitivity and virtuosity. Yesterday's performance by no means diminished their reputation. Next week's program consists of Hill's B-flat major Symphony, Harris' Fifth Symphony and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist.

'SPRING' MOOD FOR SYMPHONY

Works by Schumann, Berlioz, Williams Played

Post Feb 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A touch of spring in the air gave appropriateness to the performance at yesterday's Symphony Concert of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony (his First in B-flat major) and to the romantic ardors of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with which the programme concluded.

Less seasonal, or rather unseasonal because of the cathedral-like atmosphere, was the first number, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The viola soloist in "Harold" was Jean Lefranc, first violinist of the orchestra.

With Berlioz' extraordinary work Dr. Koussevitzky is making up for lost time. Until last April, when he revived it for Louis Bailly, who had come to play a Viola Concerto by Berezowsky, the Symphony had gone unheard here since 1919. In matters of orchestration Berlioz was not merely years but decades ahead of his time. His musical thought was also prophetic. There is a freedom and plasticity in his tonal speech that is far removed from the measured periods of the classicists and Berlioz' fellow romanticists. It is hard to believe on the evidence of the scores themselves that "Harold in Italy" was composed in 1834 and Schumann's First in 1841.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantistique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 23 1943

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 23 1943

Red Forces Hailed By Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Feb. 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and Fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. * * * "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 1 1943

CONCERT AND OPERA

Roy Harris Dedicates Fifth Symphony to Soviets—Premiere in Boston

ROY HARRIS has dedicated his new Fifth symphony to The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics "as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

As a further Soviet link for the symphony, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the première of the work next Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army.

Describing the new symphony, Mr. Harris writes that he hoped in it to express qualities of the American people which our popular dance music, by its very nature, cannot reveal. "Our people are more than pleasure-loving," Mr. Harris said. "We also have qualities of heroic strength, determination, will to struggle, faith in our destiny."

The symphony is in three movements. It will take about thirty minutes to play.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 23 1943

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 23 1943

Serge Koussevitzky Congratulates Reds

Boston, Feb. 23.—(AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Russian-born conductor, who once voluntarily exiled himself from Moscow because of disagreement with Soviet methods, has sent a congratulatory message to the Red Army and fleet.

"You have crowned your 25th anniversary with everlasting glory," Koussevitzky said. . . . "Mighty, unconquerable is the Red Army. But not in armor alone is her might; her spirit is invincible."

The message was delivered in care of the Russian Embassy, Washington.

David K. Blake, electrical engineer of Schenectady, N. Y., will address the Texas chapter of the American Institute of ... on ...

...as ...ons

An event of importance to ... music world will take place next Saturday when the first performance of an American symphony dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union is presented over the Blue network by the Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red army, the work, "Symphony No. 5," by Roy Harris, will be heard from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m. (WCFL, WEMP) and in the Latin American countries via seven short wave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell university. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 23 1943

14 MUSICIANS ASK TRIAL OF RODZINSKI

Charges of Defamation and Jeopardizing of Livelihood to Be Filed in Union

Charges of "defamation of character and jeopardizing of the livelihood of brother musicians" will be filed today against Dr. Artur Rodzinski, incoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1943-44 season, by the orchestra's union shop committee with the Musicians Union, Local 802.

The executive board of the union will meet today to consider the negotiations for a new contract for the coming season and the dismissal of fourteen members of the orchestra at the request of Dr. Rodzinski.

Announcement of the charges to be filed with William Feinberg, secretary of Local 802, against Dr. Rodzinski was made yesterday by Calmen Fleisig, chairman of the Philharmonic's union committee and one of the fourteen men recommended for dismissal at the expiration of the present contract in April.

"The naming of the fourteen dismissed members of the orchestra branded those musicians as unfit and therefore makes it impossible for them to obtain other employment," Mr. Fleisig said. He added that the decision to bring the charges was reached unanimously by the orchestra's union committee at the request of the fourteen men concerned.

Continued From Page One

Nine Men on Trial Board

In accordance with union procedure, the charges will be considered by the union's permanent trial board of nine men, headed by Max Arons. If found guilty, Dr. Rodzinski may be deprived of his union card and barred from conducting any orchestra in the United States, Mr. Fleisig said.

The trial board may rule also that a fine and compensation by Dr. Rodzinski, together with a public apology to the dismissed men, would be sufficient, provided they were reinstated in the orchestra.

As explained by Mr. Feinberg, the filing of charges against a union member by any other member or members requires that the trial board call a hearing to which both sides are invited and at which the defendant receives full opportunity to present his case. His failure to appear for such a hearing automatically would bring conviction by default, Mr. Feinberg said.

Mr. Feinberg declined, however, to discuss the projected charges against Dr. Rodzinski, saying he knew nothing about them and that "the accused has a right to face his accusers."

Management Move Awaited

As regards the larger problem of the negotiations for a new contract with the Philharmonic, he said that "the next move is up to the management."

He explained that last Friday the union had addressed a letter to the management rejecting its counter-proposal for a shortening of the coming season to twenty-four weeks at the prevailing basic wage rates and reaffirming the union's demands for the restoration of the normal thirty-week season with a 15 per cent wage increase.

"We expect that the management will reply and that a date will be set for another conference," Mr. Feinberg said.

When the union executive committee meets today it also will have before it a resolution adopted last Saturday by the entire membership of the Philharmonic Orchestra pledging the membership not to play in the 1943-44 season unless the fourteen dismissed musicians are reinstated.

Reinstatement of 14 Demanded

The resolution demanded the setting up of a dismissal committee to determine the discharge of any member of the orchestra, similar to committees functioning in the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras.

"Since the names of the men who were to be dismissed were given to the public press by the management, since this was unprecedented in the history of the Philharmonic, and since their future careers were placed in jeopardy thereby, we move as a body that all these members be reinstated for the season 1943-44," the resolution declared.

"We feel that if any judgment is taken in the heat of this controversy that the careers of the men so dismissed would be greatly endangered by a double verdict against them. We suggest that Dr. Artur Rodzinski make his recommendations for dismissal during his coming season, 1943-44, when the machinery for a dismissal committee will have been set up.

"The name of any men dismissed after the deliberations of the dismissal committee shall not be announced to the public."

Mr. Fleisig said that the orchestra's shop committee would press for approval of the resolution at today's meeting of the executive board of Local 802, and would urge that no new contract be signed unless it provided for the setting up of a dismissal committee.

He recalled that some years ago Leopold Stokowski had been brought up on charges before the union for dismissing members of his orchestra in a manner that "injured the standing and livelihood opportunities of the men" and that the conductor was forced to rehire them.

Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic, declined last night to comment on the conflict arising from the dismissal request or on any other phase of the controversy.

"We are dealing with the union, which is the representative of the men," he said. "Until the negotiations are further advanced, there will be no comment."

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

FEB 25 1943

Russia Wants to Hear Harris' New Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 24 1943

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Unsl Joe, and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I han't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took pu Debussy and Ravel with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 27 1943

Soviets To Hear Harris Symphony

Composition To Reach Russia Over Short Wave Broadcast

BOSTON (UP) — Russia — to which it is dedicated—tonight will hear Roy Harris' Symphony No. 5 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives it the world premiere performance on the air by short-wave radio and over the National Broadcasting Company network.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra gave the symphony its world premiere performance before a capacity audience here yesterday as a feature of a Russo-American program in celebration of the 25th anniversary of the founding the Red Army and Navy.

Critics generally praised the newest contribution of Harris, a member of the Cornell music department and considered by many the outstanding American composer.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 25 1943

Cornell Teacher's Symphony Has A Message For Russians

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK (AP)—Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell University, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played next Saturday (February 27) by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to us than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

HAS 3 MOVEMENTS

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our desetiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

UNLUCKY TIME

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fritz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in a minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the first by the Philharmonic.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

FEB 25 1943

Reds May Hear Broadcast Of Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 25.—(AP.)—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russiaan government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet embassy in Washington.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

FEB 25 1943

Harris Writes Symphony for The U.S.S.R.

An event of major importance to the music world will take place on Saturday, Feb. 27, when the first performance of an American Symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, is presented over the Blue Network by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red Army of the Soviet Union, the work, "Symphony No. 5" by Roy Harris, will be heard from 8:15 to 9:15 P. M., EWT, and in the Latin American countries via seven shortwave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln County, Okla., where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell University. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

In his dedication, Harris quotes Vice-President Wallace's declaration that "It is no accident that Americans and Russians like each other when they get acquainted. It is my belief that the American and Russian people can and will throw their influence on the side of a new democracy which will be the hope of all the world.

"As an American citizen," Harris goes on, "I am proud to dedicate my Fifth Symphony to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their great strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order with out losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

[41]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 23 1943

14 MUSICIANS ASK TRIAL OF RODZINSKI

Charges of Defamation and Jeopardizing of Livelihood to Be Filed in Union

Charges of "defamation of character and jeopardizing of the livelihood of brother musicians" will be filed today against Dr. Artur Rodzinski, incoming conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1943-44 season, by the orchestra's union shop committee with the Musicians Union, Local 802.

The executive board of the union will meet today to consider the negotiations for a new contract for the coming season and the dismissal of fourteen members of the orchestra at the request of Dr. Rodzinski.

Announcement of the charges to be filed with William Feinberg, secretary of Local 802, against Dr. Rodzinski was made yesterday by Calmen Fleisig, chairman of the Philharmonic's union committee and one of the fourteen men recommended for dismissal at the expiration of the present contract in April.

"The naming of the fourteen dismissed members of the orchestra branded those musicians as unfit and therefore makes it impossible for them to obtain other employment," Mr. Fleisig said. He added that the decision to bring the charges was reached unanimously by the orchestra's union committee at the request of the fourteen men concerned.

Continued From Page One

Nine Men on Trial Board

In accordance with union procedure, the charges will be considered by the union's permanent trial board of nine men, headed by Max Arons. If found guilty, Dr. Rodzinski may be deprived of his union card and barred from conducting any orchestra in the United States, Mr. Fleisig said.

The trial board may rule also that a fine and compensation by Dr. Rodzinski, together with a public apology to the dismissed men, would be sufficient, provided they were reinstated in the orchestra.

As explained by Mr. Feinberg, the filing of charges against a union member by any other member or members requires that the trial board call a hearing to which both sides are invited and at which the defendant receives full opportunity to present his case. His failure to appear for such a hearing automatically would bring conviction by default, Mr. Feinberg said.

Mr. Feinberg declined, however, to discuss the projected charges against Dr. Rodzinski, saying he knew nothing about them and that "the accused has a right to face his accusers."

Management Move Awaited

As regards the larger problem of the negotiations for a new contract with the Philharmonic, he said that "the next move is up to the management."

He explained that last Friday the union had addressed a letter to the management rejecting its counter-proposal for a shortening of the coming season to twenty-four weeks at the prevailing basic wage rates and reaffirming the union's demands for the restoration of the normal thirty-week season with a 15 per cent wage increase.

"We expect that the management will reply and that a date will be set for another conference," Mr. Feinberg said.

When the union executive committee meets today it also will have before it a resolution adopted last Saturday by the entire membership of the Philharmonic Orchestra pledging the membership not to play in the 1943-44 season unless the fourteen dismissed musicians are reinstated.

Reinstatement of 14 Demanded

The resolution demanded the setting up of a dismissal committee to determine the discharge of any member of the orchestra, similar to committees functioning in the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras.

"Since the names of the men who were to be dismissed were given to the public press by the management, since this was unprecedented in the history of the Philharmonic, and since their future careers were placed in jeopardy thereby, we move as a body that all these members be reinstated for the season 1943-44," the resolution declared.

"We feel that if any judgment is taken in the heat of this controversy that the careers of the men so dismissed would be greatly endangered by a double verdict against them. We suggest that Dr. Artur Rodzinski make his recommendations for dismissal during his coming season, 1943-44, when the machinery for a dismissal committee will have been set up.

"The name of any men dismissed after the deliberations of the dismissal committee shall not be announced to the public."

Mr. Fleisig said that the orchestra's shop committee would press for approval of the resolution at today's meeting of the executive board of Local 802, and would urge that no new contract be signed unless it provided for the setting up of a dismissal committee.

He recalled that some years ago Leopold Stokowski had been brought up on charges before the union for dismissing members of his orchestra in a manner that "injured the standing and livelihood opportunities of the men" and that the conductor was forced to rehire them.

Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic, declined last night to comment on the conflict arising from the dismissal request or on any other phase of the controversy.

"We are dealing with the union, which is the representative of the men," he said. "Until the negotiations are further advanced, there will be no comment."

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

FEB 25 1943

Russia Wants to Hear Harris' New Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 24 1943

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Unsl Joe, and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I han't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough, any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took pu Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 27 1943

Soviets To H... Harris Sympho...

Composition To R... Russia Over Sho... Wave Broadcast

BOSTON (UP) — Russia... which it is dedicated—tonigh... hear Roy Harris' Symphony... when the Boston Symphon... chestra gives it the world pre... performance on the air by ... wave radio and over the Nati... Broadcasting Company netw...

Under the direction of Dr. Ser... Koussevitzky, the orchestra ga... the symphony its world premiere performance before a capacity audience here yesterday as a feature of a Russo-American program in celebration of the 25th anniversary of the founding the Red Army and Navy.

Critics generally praised the newest contribution of Harris, a member of the Cornell music department and considered by many the outstanding American composer.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 25 1943

Cornell Teacher's Symphony Has A Message For Russians

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK (AP)—Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell University, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played next Saturday (February 27) by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to us than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

HAS 3 MOVEMENTS

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our desetiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, ...ately written and intellectu... ...teresting.

UNLUCKY TIME

...Kreisler's recent perform... ...the Philharmonic-Sym... ...at an unlucky time. ...t came on the day the ...announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fritz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in a minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the first by the Philharmonic.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

FEB 25 1943

...s May Hear ...roadcast Of Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 25.—(AP.)—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russiaan government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet embassy in Washington.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

FEB 25 1943

Harris Writes Symphony for The U.S.S.R.

An event of major importance to the music world will take place on Saturday, Feb. 27, when the first performance of an American Symphony, dedicated to the heroic people of the Soviet Union, is presented over the Blue Network by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A signal tribute not only to the Russian people, but also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red Army of the Soviet Union, the work, "Symphony No. 5" by Roy Harris, will be heard from 8:15 to 9:15 P. M., EWT, and in the Latin American countries via seven shortwave stations.

Harris, who mingled the study of music with the duties of a farmer in Lincoln County, Okla., where he was born Feb. 12, 1898, is now associated with the music department of Cornell University. His first four symphonies were also introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose entire conductorial career has been marked by the initial interpretation of the works of new composers.

In his dedication, Harris quotes Vice-President Wallace's declaration that "It is no accident that Americans and Russians like each other when they get acquainted. It is my belief that the American and Russian people can and will throw their influence on the side of a new democracy which will be the hope of all the world.

"As an American citizen," Harris goes on, "I am proud to dedicate my Fifth Symphony to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their great strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order with out losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

[41]

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Uncle Joe and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I can't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took up Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB

Reds Ask Chance to Hear Symphony by Roy Harris

New Composition To Be Broadcast to Russia Tomorrow

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries has notified Roy Harris, forty-five-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Mr. Harris's symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great Ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Mr. Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It said that the society "warmly greets great artists of great friendly nation. Music is mighty means for communion of people. It helps strengthen ranks of defenders of liberty and democracy. We would like to hear your symphony here."

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

FEB 2[illegible]43

Homage to Ray Harris

9 Russian Musicians Cable Tribute to American Composer of Heroic Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (INS).—Nine Russian composers today paid homage to Roy Harris, American musician, by transatlantic cable.

Harris is here to put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its final paces in the interpretation of his Fifth Symphony, which will have its premier performance today under the baton of Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky. The work was dedicated to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the U. S. S. R."

The cablegram read:

"Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers of the U. S. S. R. greet in your person young music by American people. Across seas and oceans, we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory!"

It was signed by Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalsvsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 26 1943

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 26 1943

Music And Drama

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, Dedicated to Russia, To Be Played Tonight by Boston Symphony Orch.

BOSTON, Feb. 25-AP-A message of greeting and friendship to Roy Harris and through him to Americans interested in music everywhere arrived tonight from nine Soviet composers as the Oklahoma-born composer eagerly awaited tomorrow's first performance anywhere of his new Fifth Syphony, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Republics.

The message came fast on the heels of another one today from the U. S. R. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries notifying Harris that it would like to hear he symphony in Russia.

The Harris symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the lics," will be played at two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The Saturday night performance will be broadcast in America and short-waved to Russia.

The message from the Soviet composers reached Harris tonight by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

It read: "Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers USSR greet in your person young music American people. Across seas and oceans we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory."

It was signed by leading Soviet composers Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalevsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL
FEB 26 1943

Russians To Hear U. S. War Symphony

Boston—(AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries Thursday notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 26 1943

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

REQUEST OF RUSSIANS TO HEAR HARRIS' SYMPHONY IS GRANTED

BOSTON, (AP)—The U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell university's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious — for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian sponsored society reached him by relay thru the Soviet embassy in Washington.

In preparing his dedication, Harris had written "as an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my fifth symphony to the heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 26 1943

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony Will Be Tribute To Russia

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell university, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played tomorrow by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to use than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fitz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in A minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the firstt by the Philharmonic.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 27 1943

This Clipping From SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE
FEB 27 1943

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 27 1943

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 27 1943

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 27 1943

SYMPHONY HONORS RED ARMY, FLEET

Boston Orchestra Presents World Premiere of Composition Dedicated to U. S. S. R.

Boston, Feb. 27.—(AP)—American and Russian music were joined in symbolic harmony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red Army and Red Fleet and featured the world premiere of an American symphony dedicated to the U. S. S. R.

The new work—the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's music department—occupied a prominent place on a program cleverly designed to honor both nations by Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian-born conductor who is now an American citizen.

The Harris symphony came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between the lanky American, nine Russian composers and the U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris in turn dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Koussevitzky began the program by dedicating the concert to the "glorious Russian army * * * we will begin with the Russian anthem." The Internationale immediately was followed by our own national anthem.

The Harris symphony more than lived up to expectations. A martial first movement—somewhat less brilliantly original than the others—was followed by a rhapsodic, choral style second section. The moving finale, in fugue form, developed into a stirring, emotion-lifting climax.

[42]

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Uncle Joe and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I can't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took up Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

Homage to Ray Harris

9 Russian Musicians Cable Tribute to American Composer of Heroic Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (INS).—Nine Russian composers today paid homage to Roy Harris, American musician, by transatlantic cable.

Harris is here to put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its final paces in the interpretation of his Fifth Symphony, which will have its premier performance today under the baton of Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky. The work was dedicated to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the U. S. S. R."

The cablegram read:

"Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers of the U. S. S. R. greet in your person young music by American people. Across seas and oceans, we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory!"

It was signed by Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalsvsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From
OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1943

Russians To Hear U. S. War Symphony

Boston—(AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries Thursday notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

Reds Ask Chance to Hear Symphony by Roy Harris

New Composition To Be Broadcast to Russia Tomorrow

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries has notified Roy Harris, forty-five-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Mr. Harris's symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great Ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Mr. Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It said that the society "warmly greets great artists of great friendly nation. Music is mighty means for communion of people. It helps strengthen ranks of defenders of liberty and democracy. We would like to hear your symphony here."

This Clipping From NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

REQUEST OF RUSSIANS TO HEAR HARRIS' SYMPHONY IS GRANTED

BOSTON, (AP)—The U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell university's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious — for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay thru the Soviet embassy in Washington.

In preparing his dedication, Harris had written "as an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my fifth symphony to the heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 26 1943

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony Will Be Tribute To Russia

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell university, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played tomorrow by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to use than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fitz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in A minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the firstt by the Philharmonic.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

Music And Drama

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, Dedicated to Russia, To Be Played Tonight by Boston Symphony Orch.

BOSTON, Feb. 25-AP-A message of greeting and friendship to Roy Harris and through him to Americans interested in music everywhere arrived tonight from nine Soviet composers as the Oklahoma-born composer eagerly awaited tomorrow's first performance anywhere of his new Fifth Syphony, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Republics.

The message came fast on the heels of another one today from the U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries notifying Harris that it would like to hear he symphony in Russia.

The Harris symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Soviet Republics," will be played at two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The Saturday night performance will be broadcast in America and short-waved to Russia.

The message from the Soviet composers reached Harris tonight by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

It read: "Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers USSR greet in your person young music American people. Across seas and oceans we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory."

It was signed by leading Soviet composers Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalevsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 27 43

This Clipping From SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

FEB 27 43

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 27 1943

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 27 43

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Plays New York In Russian Tribute

Boston, Feb. 26.—(AP.)—American and Russian music were joined in symbolic harmony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army and Red fleet and featured the world premiere of an American symphony dedicated to the USSR.

The new work, the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris, 45-years-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, occupied a prominent place on a program cleverly designed to honor both nations by Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian-born conductor who is now an American citizen.

The Harris symphony came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between the lanky American, nine Russian composers and the USSR Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work, a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved, and Harris in turn dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Koussevitsky began the program by dedicating the concerts, it will be repeated tomorrow night, to the "glorious Russian army. We will begin with the Russian anthem." The Internationale immediately was followed by our own national anthem.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Uncle Joe and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I can't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took up Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB

Reds Ask Chance to Hear Symphony by Roy Harris

NewComposition To Be Broadcast to Russia Tomorrow

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries has notified Roy Harris, forty-five-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Mr. Harris's symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great Ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Mr. Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It said that the society "warmly greets great artists of great friendly nation. Music is mighty means for communion of people. It helps strengthen ranks of defenders of liberty and democracy. We would like to hear your symphony here."

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

Homage to Ray Harris

9 Russian Musicians Cable Tribute to American Composer of Heroic Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (INS).—Nine Russian composers today paid homage to Roy Harris, American musician, by transatlantic cable.

Harris is here to put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its final paces in the interpretation of his Fifth Symphony, which will have its premier performance today under the baton of Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky. The work was dedicated to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the U. S. S. R."

The cablegram read:

"Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers of the U. S. S. R. greet in your person young music by American people. Across seas and oceans, we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory!"

It was signed by Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalsvsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From
OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1943

Russians To Hear U. S. War Symphony

Boston—(AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries Thursday notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

This Clipping From NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

REQUEST OF RUSSIANS TO HEAR HARRIS' SYMPHONY IS GRANTED

BOSTON, (AP)—The U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell university's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious — for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay thru the Soviet embassy in Washington.

In preparing his dedication, Harris had written "as an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my fifth symphony to the heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 26 1943

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony Will Be Tribute To Russia

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell university, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played tomorrow by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to use than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fitz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in A minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the firstt by the Philharmonic.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

Music And Drama

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, Dedicated to Russia, To Be Played Tonight by Boston Symphony Orch.

BOSTON, Feb. 25-AP-A message of greeting and friendship to Roy Harris and through him to Americans interested in music everywhere arrived tonight from nine Soviet composers as the Oklahoma-born composer eagerly awaited tomorrow's first performance anywhere of his new Fifth Syphony, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Republics.

The message came fast on the heels of another one today from the U. S. R. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries notifying Harris that it would like to hear he symphony in Russia.

The Harris symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be played at two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The Saturday night performance will be broadcast in America and short-waved to Russia.

The message from the Soviet composers reached Harris tonight by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

It read: "Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers USSR greet your person young music A[illegible] people. Across seas and o[illegible] extend you our hand in fraternal handshake. Lon[illegible] victory."

It was signed by lea[illegible] composers Gliere, Sh[illegible] Prokofieff, Myaskovsky[illegible] uryan, Kabalevsky, [illegible] Khrennikov and Biely[illegible]

This C[illegible]
NEW[illegible]

[illegible] to the Rational.

[illegible] Information on how to make re[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Uncle Joe and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I can't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took up Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1943

Reds Ask Chance to Hear Symphony by Roy Harris

New Composition To Be Broadcast to Russia Tomorrow

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries has notified Roy Harris, forty-five-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Mr. Harris's symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great Ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Mr. Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It said that the society "warmly greets great artists of great friendly nation. Music is mighty means for communion of people. It helps strengthen ranks of defenders of liberty and democracy. We would like to hear your symphony here."

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

Homage to Ray Harris

9 Russian Musicians Cable Tribute to American Composer of Heroic Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (INS).—Nine Russian composers today paid homage to Roy Harris, American musician, by transatlantic cable.

Harris is here to put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its final paces in the interpretation of his Fifth Symphony, which will have its premier performance today under the baton of Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky. The work was dedicated to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the U. S. S. R."

The cablegram read:

"Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers of the U. S. S. R. greet in your person young music by American people. Across seas and oceans, we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory!"

It was signed by Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalsvsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

This Clipping From OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1943

Russians To Hear U. S. War Symphony

Boston—(AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries Thursday notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

Music And

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, To Be Played Tonight by B

BOSTON, Feb. 25-AP-A message of greeting and friendship to Roy Harris and through him to Americans interested in music everywhere arrived tonight from nine Soviet composers as the Oklahoma-born composer eagerly awaited tomorrow's first performance anywhere of his new Fifth Syphony, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Republics.

The message came fast on the heels of another one today from the U. S. R. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries notifying Harris that it would like to hear he symphony in Russia.

The Harris symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-lov ing people of our great ally, the

REQUEST OF RUSSIANS TO HEAR HARRIS' SYMPHONY IS GRANTED

BOSTON, (AP)—The U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell university's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious — for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay thru the Soviet embassy in Washington.

In preparing his dedication, Harris had written "as an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my fifth symphony to the heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 26 1943

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony Will Be Tribute To Russia

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell university, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played tomorrow by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to use than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fitz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in A minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the firstt by the Philharmonic.

RUSSIA TRIBUTE

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 27. (AP)—American and Russian music were joined in symbolic harmony by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the 25th anniversary of the founding of the red army and red fleet and featured the world premiere of an American symphony dedicated to the U. S. S. R.

The new work—the Fifth Symphony, by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell university's music department—occupied a prominent place on a program cleverly designed to honor both nations by Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian-born conductor who is now an American citizen.

The Harris symphony came to Symphony hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between the lanky American, nine Russian composers and the U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris in turn dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

[42]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Anthem in Red Army Salute

BY G. L. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its large audience in Metropolitan Theatre last night saluted the valor and the military achievements of the Russian people.

It chanced to be the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and navy, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky not only gave the sixth symphony of Shostakovitch the chief place on the program but also, in "honor and admiration," began the concert with the Russian anthem. The audience rose in respect. The American anthem followed.

Both the playing of the Russian anthem and the demonstration by the audience were awesome examples of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. Even a short memory can remember when the Russian anthem was virtually the last thing in the world that the orchestra would be likely to play; and some of those who stood last night must have said, in their hearts or in the marketplace, many a hard word against Mother Russia and Uncle Joe and may do so again. There is a good Latin phrase to polish off the situation, but I can't remember it. All I can do is hope that this war-forged admiration will be strong enough to endure the stress of peace.

The concert began officially with Mozart's Symphony No. 34, in C major. It was like fragrance from a vanished and less wicked world—vanished, certainly, but not less wicked; simply lacking modern facilities. Dr. Koussevitzky evoked the charm of the music; the rare tone and magnificent flexibility of the strings were displayed superbly, and every phrase shone. To the quiet second movement, the audience listened with happily bated cough; any one of the hundreds that resounded between the movements would have ruined it.

Putting aside Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky took up Debussy and Ravel, with both of whom he is accustomed to slay his thousands and his tens of thousands. He did not fail this time. Never have the woodwinds responded with more grace and fluency, the brasses with more sonority and elan, the percussion with more vital timing. Occasionally, to be frank, it was all more than a bit noisy, but it gave the listeners a thrill from first to last. For his part in providing the sensuous sweetness of the "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Mr. Laurent, flutist, was summoned from the ranks to bow several times. Dr. Koussevitzky and the whole orchestra were ecstatically applauded for their virtuosity in the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

The performance of the Shostakovitch sixth was ardent yet contained. There is an arresting melancholy in the first movement and certainly much skill and liveliness in the two others; but 100 of the finest musicians in the world would have yet to convince me that it is great. Would that all of Russia might have been there to hear the splendid playing of their countryman's music and the applause it got.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 2 [illegible]

Reds Ask Chance to Hear Symphony by Roy Harris

NewComposition To Be Broadcast to Russia Tomorrow

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP).—The U. S. S. R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries has notified Roy Harris, forty-five-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Mr. Harris's symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great Ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Mr. Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It said that the society "warmly greets great artists of great friendly nation. Music is mighty means for communion of people. It helps strengthen ranks of defenders of liberty and democracy. We would like to hear your symphony here."

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

FEB 2[illegible] 43

Homage to Ray Harris

9 Russian Musicians Cable Tribute to American Composer of Heroic Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (INS).—Nine Russian composers today paid homage to Roy Harris, American musician, by transatlantic cable.

Harris is here to put the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its final paces in the interpretation of his Fifth Symphony, which will have its premier performance today under the baton of Russian-born Serge Koussevitsky. The work was dedicated to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the U. S. S. R."

The cablegram read:

"Greetings to Roy Harris. Composers of the U. S. S. R. greet in your person young music by American people. Across seas and oceans, we extend you our hand in sincere fraternal handshake. Long live our victory!"

It was signed by Gliere, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, Myaskovsky, Khachaturyan, Kabalsvsky, Muradeli, Khrennikov and Biely.

This Clipping From NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

This Clipping From OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

FEB 26 1943

Russians To Hear U. S. War Symphony

Boston—(AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries Thursday notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer—now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new fifth symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 26 1943

HARRIS WORK TO GO ON AIR

Symphony Will Be Broadcast in Response to U.S.S.R. Request

BOSTON, Feb. 25 (AP)—The U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries today notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer now associated with Cornell University's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious—for Harris's Fifth symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And one of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by shortwave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony Hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian Government-sponsored society reached him by relay through the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

REQUEST OF RUSSIANS TO HEAR HARRIS' SYMPHONY IS GRANTED

BOSTON, (AP)—The U. S. S. R. society for cultural relations with foreign countries notified Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma-born American composer — now associated with Cornell university's music department, that it would like to hear his new Fifth Symphony in Russia.

That wish may be swiftly granted—if atmospheric conditions are propitious — for Harris' symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," will be performed for the first time this week in two concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra. One of the concerts will be broadcast in America and by short wave to Russia Saturday night.

As Harris sat today in Symphony hall going over his final markings on the score for this morning's rehearsal, the message from the Russian government-sponsored society reached him by relay thru the Soviet embassy in Washington.

In preparing his dedication, Harris had written "as an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my fifth symphony to the heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

FEB 26 1943

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony Will Be Tribute To Russia

By JOHN SELBY
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell university, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work is being played tomorrow by the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance is to be radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This is because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to use than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fitz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in A minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the firstt by the Philharmonic.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 26 1943

Music And

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony To Be Played Tonight by B

BOSTON, Feb. 25-AP-A message of greeting and friendship to Roy Harris and through him to Americans interested in music everywhere arrived tonight from nine Soviet composers as the Oklahoma-born composer eagerly awaited tomorrow's first performance anywhere of his new Fifth Syphony, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Republics.

The message came fast on the heels of another one today from the U. S. R. R. Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries notifying Harris that it would like to hear he symphony in Russia.

The Harris symphony, dedicated "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the

OAKS APPOINTED ST. JOE RANGER

CLARKIA, Idaho, Feb. 27. (Special.)—Merle Oaks, former assistant in forest service blister rust, has been appointed ranger of Round Top district in St. Joe national forest, replacing Ranger Cortland James who has been transferred to Montana.

Oaks recently returned from California where he has been on the government guayule project.

The Pinochle club will meet at the schoolhouse Saturday at 8 p. m. with Paul Larson and I. U. Probst hosts.

Miss Thelma Bellows and Miss Betty Tracy are visiting Anna[illegible]

[illegible] an excuse to occupy more [illegible]'s territory and to keep in large army estimated to many as 200,000.

[illegible]ame time both the Germans [illegible]allans were interested in di- potential anti-Axis elements of d[illegible]

Main Street in the Connecticut Light & Power Company store, will be open under the direction of volunteer aides from noon to 5 p. m. and on Saturdays from 10 a. m. to noon. Mrs. William F. Doran is chairman in charge. There will b[illegible]

Church services for Sunday include: Trinity Lutheran church, Lewiston, the Rev. Orrin Conser; "For Me to Live is Christ"; First Church of Christ of Clarkston, the Rev. Frank T. Carter; "Life's Most Dangerous Word"; First Baptist church, Lewiston, the Rev. Ben William Jackson, "Seven Things God Hates"; First Methodist church, Lewiston, the Rev. J. J. Millington, "Fishers of Men"; First Christian church, Lewiston, the Rev. Marvin E. Smith, "Let the Church Be the Church"; Episcopal church, Lewiston, the Rev. William A. Gilbert, "Duty"; Church of Christ, Lewiston, the Rev. LeRoy P. Wiley, "The New and Living Way"; St. John's Lutheran church, Clarkston, the Rev. George Frey, "The Parable the Sower."

[illegible] Nez Perce and Asotin [illegible] will begin their drive March 8 to raise $14,500.

...ork, Dedicated to Russia, Is Feature of Special Program

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (AP)—American and Russian music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army and Red Fleet and featured the world première of an American symphony dedicated to the U.S.S.R.

The new work—the Fifth symphony by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's Music Department—occupied a prominent place on a program designed by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, to honor both nations.

The composition came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between Mr. Harris, nine Russian composers and the U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris, in turn, dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Herald - Jan. 27, 43

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave the 17th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Alexander Borovsky, pianist, and the program was as follows:

Hill.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 34
Harris.....Symphony No. 5, Op. 55
Prokofieff.....Concerto No. 3 for Piano and orchestra, Op. 26

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its world premiere at the Symphony Concert yesterday, is unquestionably a significant composition. It may even be that it is the first truly indigenous composition of any lasting significance; there are those who smell the open prairies, the towering peaks and the more intimate details of American agriculture in its textures. Frankly, we do not know. But one thing is certain: The Fifth Symphony is living music with a drive and a force that cannot fail in its effect on an audience willing to listen and to understand.

Mr. Harris has cast his major work in the strictly classical forms of the prelude, chorale and fugue. They are forms he has spoken in before; in point of fact, the greater portion of his music reveals his absorption in these established patterns, but he has by no means used them verbatim. On the contrary, he has—frequently by brute strength—forced them into his own mould, and he has clothed them in music of his own undeniable personal idiom. Where in previous works that idiom has not always been under control, with the result that his compositions have either lulled you unquietly to sleep—as in the Quartet—or exasperated you with obvious straining for significance, the Fifth Symphony reveals the composer as master, at least, of his materials. Thus the Fifth Symphony is important, not for itself alone, but for the fact that it seems to represent the composer at the turning point of his career. Everything lies beyond, or nothing. It is in the Sixth Symphony that Mr. Harris will reveal his stature as an inspired creative artist, or prove once and for all that his endowments are those of the master craftsman.

As to the Fifth Symphony, it reveals time and again the aspects of the self-conscious prophet of Americana, and in that regard it has much in common with Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, as both Shostakovitch and Harris were motivated by much the same impulse to apotheosize the homeland. Yet, like those who self-consciously sit down to write the great American novel or the great American play, it isn't that easy, for the truly monumental work springs into being without premeditation.

At its best, the Fifth Symphony is a tremendously exciting composition—just like the Seventh of Shostakovitch. At its worst, however, it differs from Shostakovitch's banalities by being pseudo-intellectual, for the forms employed lead into such channels. So the chorale, which for more than half its length is of extraordinary strength and beauty, becomes at last a long-drawn-out exercise in free counterpoint; the prelude, on the contrary, commences with disjointed rhythmic sequences, gains momentum with the development of a more straightforward beat, and ends superbly. The fugue finale, employing a typically American rhythmico-melodic statement, thrashes about intellectually for a time, gets a grip on itself and also ends superbly. Throughout, however—and this is the important thing—there is a feeling for the lyric quality, as though the composer had actually been inspired with a sort of Whitmanesque passion.

Inasmuch as the composer has worked closely with Dr. Koussevitzky all week in the preparation of it, yesterday's performance must be considered authoritative. His orchestral technique, although prodigious, lacks the finesse and the polish of the continental style (as is doubtless appropriate to "American" music), so the notes do not lie under the fingers, so to speak. The Fifth consequently is not easy to perform or conduct, but it must be said orchestra and conductor came through heroically.

The concert opened with a fine performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's by no means inferior First Symphony, and closed with Prokofieff's highly entertaining Third Piano Concerto, Alexander Borovsky playing the fierce piano part and comparing very well with the composer himself, who last performed the work here. As the concert was dedicated to the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red Army, Dr. Koussevitzky preceded the "Star Spangled Banner" with the Russian Internationale. Both Mr. Harris and Mr. Hill were in the audience, by the way, and both were warmly received by the audience, whose enthusiasm for the whole program was not exactly unbounded.

Globe MUSIC Feb. 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky has dedicated the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week to the valiant Army of Soviet Russia, founded 25 years ago. And at these concerts for the first time the anthem of Soviet Russia, the "Internationale," is played.

Always one to appreciate the dramatic nature of an unusual occasion, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke to the audience upon his first appearance yesterday afternoon, "Because these concerts are dedicated to the glorious Russian Army," he said, "we shall begin with the Russian Anthem." So they did, all in Symphony Hall standing. "The Star Spangled Banner," again with the conductor inviting the audience to sing, followed.

Brazilian Composer Coming to Symphony

Camargo Guarnieri Will Appear Tomorrow

Each week brings new evidence of the growing and powerful friendship between the Americas, and an especially pleasant contribution to inter-American relations will be tomorrow's Symphony Concert, when the talented young Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri, will share conducting honors with Boston's beloved Serge Koussevitzky, directing the first performance here of his "Abertura Concertante." Two North American composers also will have first performances of their works tomorrow—William Schuman's Cantata, "A Free Song," and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, will sing the cantata with the orchestra.

Boston's Pan-American Society will be represented tomorrow by many of its members, who are also regular patrons of the Friday concerts, among them the society's president, Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall, Miss Fanny Adams, Mrs. Talbot Aldrich, Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, Mrs. Russell S. Codman, Mrs. Louis Curtis Jr., Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Christian A. Herter, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Miss Isabella Grandin, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. Guy W. Currier, Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Richard B. Hobart, Mrs. Parkman D. Howe Jr., Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. Langdon Warner, Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth and Mrs. Edward Thaw are among them.

Pan-American Society members who are enrolled as Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra include Gov. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mr. and Mrs. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Mrs. Henry L. Beveridge, Miss Constance Goodrich and Miss Fanny Mason. Miss Susan Godoy is still another, and she is also on the music committee of the society, whose members, all Symphony-goers, also include Miss Isadore Falcao, daughter of the Brasilian Consul, Senor Ildefonso Falcao; Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. George Hawley, Mrs. Richard Hobart, Mrs. Chester Humphrey, Mrs. Edward Taft, Mrs. Langdon Warner and Mrs. Edward Thaw, George W. Briggs, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Quincy Porter and Nicholas Slonimsky.

SYMPHONY BY HARRIS IN BOSTON PREMIERE

Times Feb. 27, 43

Work, Dedicated to Russia, Is Feature of Special Program

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (AP)—American and Russian music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army and Red Fleet and featured the world première of an American symphony dedicated to the U.S.S.R.

The new work—the Fifth symphony by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's Music Department—occupied a prominent place on a program designed by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, to honor both nations.

The composition came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between Mr. Harris, nine Russian composers and the U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris, in turn, dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
FEB 28 1943

DICTATOR OF THE BATON

Koussevitzky's Technique So Exact He Names Music By Photos

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

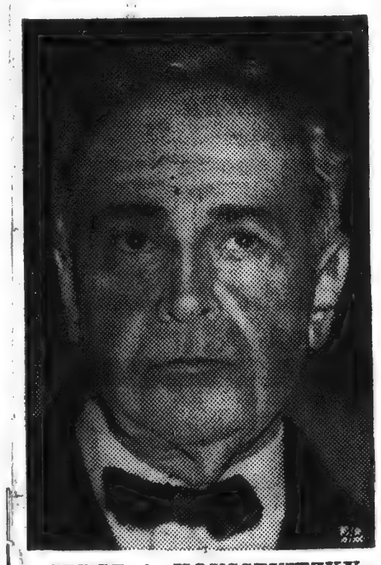
"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like "Zee." "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky, conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 9 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has moulded the Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.



SERGE A. KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5,000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

Koussevitzky works as hard as the men. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

Indicative of the conductor's devotion to his art was his refusal to permit political differences to affect his musical tastes. Although a voluntary exile from Russia in 1920, he recently hailed the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Soviet Union during the second World War.

[43]

Today IN SOCIETY

Boston Globe

Hail Soviet Anthem at Symphony Hall

Feb. 27, 1943

Roy Harris' 5th Symphony Has World Premiere

Uniforms and distinguished gues[ts] arked the great audience th[at] se at Serge Koussevitsky's e[n]ance to the Symphony Hall sta[ge] esterday, and remained standi[ng] hrough the Russian national a[n]em, played yesterday in honor [of] he 25th anniversary of the Sovi[et] rmy.

Played also in honor of Russia magnificent Army, to whom it edicated, was Roy Harris' Fift[h] ymphony, which had its worl[d] remiere yesterday at the goo[d] ands of Dr. Koussevitzky and th[e] ymphony Orchestra.

Special guests at both the Sym[-] hony and the regular Frida[y] ymphony luncheon at the Copley laza were Capt. Stepan Panjilov nd the radio operator of his Rus[-] ian merchant ship, attractive littl[e] ilya Bogdanova. At the luncheon hey sat at a gala decorated Rus[-] ian War Relief head table and istened intently to their talented ompatriot, Boris Goldovsky, as he llustrated his entertaining program alk at the piano. Still another istinguished guest from Russia yes[-] erday was the Symphony soloist Alexander Borovsky.

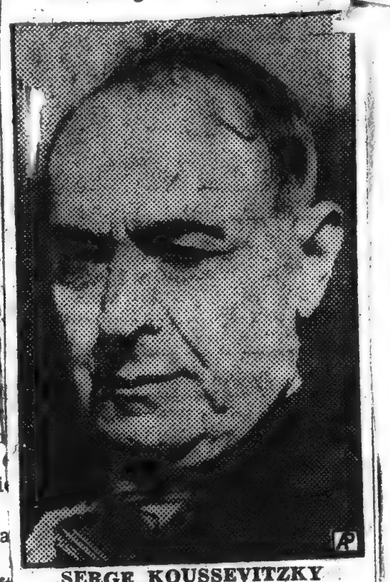
Sharing the Russian guests at the Copley luncheon were Dr. Hugh Cabot, Massachusetts head of Rus[-] sian War Relief, and Mrs. Cabot, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Mrs. Alexander Samoiloff, talented artist and executive committee member of Russian War Relief; Mrs. John R. van Nagell, Mrs. George h[.] Faxon. Both composer Roy Harris and Mrs. Harris were guests of Mr and Mrs. Goldovsky as were Mr and Mrs. Richard Burgin and Mrs. Quincy Porter. Hostesses at th[e] Copley yesterday included Mr[s.] Charles M. Spofford, Mrs. Cham[-] ning H. Cox, Mrs. H. Parker Whit[-] tington, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smit[h] and Mrs. E. Russell Norton, and th[e] many tables of guests included Mr and Mrs. Aaron Richmond and Mr[s.] Richmond's sister, Mrs. Henry Ne[l-] burn of Los Angeles, Mrs. Henry [F.] Laughlin and her daughter, Mr[s.] David B. Rodd, whose husband, member of the R. C. A. F., is abroa[d] on active service, and Mrs. Frankli[n] W. Hobbs.

British naval officers, sailors fro[m] New Zealand and Australia, and number of French sailors, as well a[s] American soldiers, sailors, Coa[st] Guardsmen and officers, lent colo[r] to the big appreciative audience.

SNAPSHOTS — Alex William[s] home yesterday on leave fro[m] Army duty, back in his old seat [in] Symphony again. . . The Dudle[y] Pickmans walking over from 3[0] Commonwealth av. . . Mrs. Grafto[n] Fay also among the brisk walker[s] furs back everywhere in deferen[ce] to the sharp cold outside. . . Mr[s.] Alvan T. Fuller's nice sables over deep green suit. . . Mrs. Olive Wolcott and Mrs. Frederick Ayer among the North Shore neighbo[rs] down by train. . . Mrs. Willia[m] Morris Hunt (Rosamond Pier) in b[lack] subway from Milton, a fetching li[t-] tle velvet and fur hood tied ov[er] her lovely fair hair. . . Katherin[e] Warner also in from Milton, . . Mrs. Charles F. Woodard (Gwe[n-] dolen Livermore) in suave cinn[a-] mon shades, a brief veil on her litt[le] square-crowned hat. . . Mrs. Robe[rt] H. Stevenson. . . Mrs. Hugh Ba[r-] croft and her daughter, Mrs. Ern[est] E. Decker. . . Carol Warren. blonde Louise Sargent. . . Mrs. A[r-] thur Fiedler. . . the Edward Jac[k-] son Holmes.

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
FEB 28 1943

Koussevitzky's Gestures Identify The Composition



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green Room at Symphony Hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony Hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky, conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has moulded the Boston Symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.

RETURNS TO RADIO

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony Hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs "Fine, fine," and half-sits half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Herald - JAN. 27, 43

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave the 17th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Alexander Borovsky, pianist, and the program was as follows:

Hill.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 34
Harris.....Symphony No. 5, Op. 55
Prokofieff....Concerto No. 3 for Piano and orchestra, Op. 26

Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its world premiere at the Symphony Concert yesterday, is unquestionably a significant composition. It may even be that it is the first truly indigenous composition of any lasting significance; there are those who smell the open prairies, the towering peaks and the more intimate details of American agriculture in its textures. Frankly, we do not know. But one thing is certain: The Fifth Symphony is living music with a drive and a force that cannot fail in its effect on an audience willing to listen and to understand.

Mr. Harris has cast his major work in the strictly classical forms of the prelude, chorale and fugue. They are forms he has spoken in before; in point of fact, the greater portion of his music reveals his absorption in these established patterns, but he has by no means used them verbatim. On the contrary, he has—frequently by brute strength—forced them into his own mould, and he has clothed them in music of his own undeniable personal idiom. Where in previous works that idiom has not always been under control, with the result that his compositions have either lulled you unquietly to sleep—as in the Quartet—or exasperated you with obvious straining for significance, the Fifth Symphony reveals the composer as master, at least, of his materials. Thus the Fifth Symphony is important, not for itself alone, but for the fact that it seems to represent the composer at the turning point of his career. Everything lies beyond, or nothing. It is in the Sixth Symphony that Mr. Harris will reveal his stature as an inspired creative artist, or prove once and for all that his endowments are those of the master craftsman.

As to the Fifth Symphony, it reveals time and again the aspects of the self-conscious prophet of Americana, and in that regard it has much in common with Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, as both Shostakovitch and Harris were motivated by much the same impulse to apotheosize the homeland. Yet, like those who self-consciously sit down to write the great American novel or the great American play, it isn't that easy, for the truly monumental work springs into being without premeditation.

At its best, the Fifth Symphony is a tremendously exciting composition—just like the Seventh of Shostakovitch. At its worst, however, it differs from Shostakovitch's banalities by being pseudo-intellectual, for the forms employed lead into such channels. So the chorale, which for more than half its length is of extraordinary strength and beauty, becomes at last a long-drawn-out exercise in free counterpoint; the prelude, on the contrary, commences with disjointed rhythmic sequences, gains momentum with the development of a more straightforward beat, and ends superbly. The fugue finale, employing a typically American rhythmico-melodic statement, thrashes about intellectually for a time, gets a grip on itself and also ends superbly. Throughout, however—and this is the important thing—there is a feeling for the lyric quality, as though the composer had actually been inspired with a sort of Whitmanesque passion.

Inasmuch as the composer has worked closely with Dr. Koussevitzky all week in the preparation of it, yesterday's performance must be considered authoritative. His orchestral technique, although prodigious, lacks the finesse and the polish of the continental style (as is doubtless appropriate to "American" music), so the notes do not lie under the fingers, so to speak. The Fifth consequently is not easy to perform or conduct, but it must be said orchestra and conductor came through heroically.

The concert opened with a fine performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's by no means inferior First Symphony, and closed with Prokofieff's highly entertaining Third Piano Concerto, Alexander Borovsky playing the fierce piano part and comparing very well with the composer himself, who last performed the work here. As the concert was dedicated to the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red Army, Dr. Koussevitzky preceded the "Star Spangled Banner" with the Russian Internationale. Both Mr. Harris and Mr. Hill were in the audience, by the way, and both were warmly received by the audience, whose enthusiasm for the whole program was not exactly unbounded.

Globe MUSIC Feb. 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky has dedicated the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week to the valiant Army of Soviet Russia, founded 25 years ago. And at these concerts for the first time the anthem of Soviet Russia, the "Internationale," is played.

Always one to appreciate the dramatic nature of an unusual occasion, Mr. Koussevitzky spoke to the audience upon his first appearance yesterday afternoon. "Because these concerts are dedicated to the glorious Russian Army," he said, "we shall begin with the Russian Anthem." So they did, all in Symphony Hall standing. "The Star Spangled Banner," again with the conductor inviting the audience to sing, followed

Brazilian Composer Coming to Symphony

Camargo Guarnieri Will Appear Tomorrow

Each week brings new evidence of the growing and powerful friendship between the Americas, and an especially pleasant contribution to inter-American relations will be tomorrow's Symphony Concert, when the talented young Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri, will share conducting honors with Boston's beloved Serge Koussevitzky, directing the first performance here of his "Abertura Concertante." Two North American composers also will have first performances of their works tomorrow—William Schuman's Cantata, "A Free Song," and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, will sing the cantata with the orchestra.

Boston's Pan-American Society will be represented tomorrow by many of its members, who are also regular patrons of the Friday concerts, among them the society's president, Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall, Miss Fanny Adams, Mrs. Talbot Aldrich, Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, Mrs. Russell S. Codman, Mrs. Louis Curtis Jr., Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Christian A. Herter, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Miss Isabella Grandin, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. Guy W. Currier, Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Richard B. Hobart, Mrs. Parkman D. Howe Jr., Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. Langdon Warner, Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth and Mrs. Edward Thaw are among them.

Pan-American Society members who are enrolled as Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra include Gov. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mr. and Mrs. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Mrs. Henry L. Beveridge, Miss Constance Goodrich and Miss Fanny Mason. Miss Susan Godoy is still another, and she is also on the music committee of the society, whose members, all Symphony-goers, also include Miss Isadore Falcao, daughter of the Brasilian Consul, Senor Ildefonso Falcao; Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. George Hawley, Mrs. Richard Hobart, Mrs. Chester Humphrey, Mrs. Edward Taft, Mrs. Langdon Warner and Mrs. Edward Thaw, George W. Briggs, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Quincy Porter and Nicholas Slonimsky.

SYMPHONY BY HARRIS IN BOSTON PREMIERE

Times Feb. 27, 43

Work, Dedicated to Russia, Is Feature of Special Program

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (AP)—American and Russian music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army and Red Fleet and featured the world première of an American symphony dedicated to the U.S.S.R.

The new work—the Fifth symphony by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's Music Department—occupied a prominent place on a program designed by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, to honor both nations.

The composition came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between Mr. Harris, nine Russian composers and the U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris, in turn, dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES

FEB 28 1943

DICTATOR OF THE BATON

Koussevitzky's Technique So Exact He Names Music By Photos

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

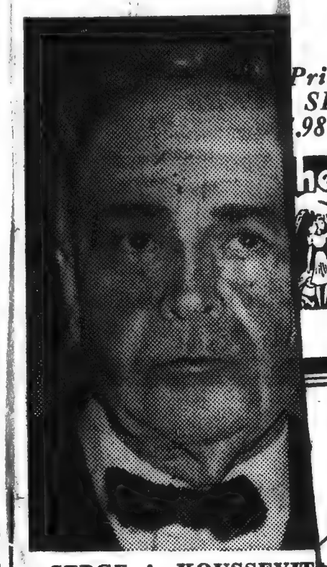
"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like "Zee." "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definit... the pictures were ma... Koussevitzky's knowled... candid camera expert, ... black mask and black ... prevent reflections, fr... hole behind the orga... Symphony hall.

A similar thing ha... reverse order after the ... symphonic festival. W... the festival, while ... silent motion picture ... vitzky, conducting a... wood, members of the ... suddenly began singing ... ing the music from his ...

More than 50 years ... cipline and training ... this exquisitely exact ... ing technique. During ... 9 of those years, the ... old Russian-born "di... the baton" has mou... Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperam... idly controlled, made po... multiple accomplishment... conductor at 12, ackn... the world's finest dou... virtuoso before he was ... formed his own orchestra ... sia, and conducted in ma... pean capitals before co... Boston in 1924.



SERGE A. KOUSSEVIT...

Noted for interpretatio... contemporary works, esp... Russian, and for his inter... modern American com... Koussevitzky today is ... heard throughout the country ... cently the orchestra signed a ... tract with the American Fed... tion of Musicians permitting ... return to the air after a five-... lapse. Already more than 5... letters have been received fr... the vast radio audience wh... listens in on the Saturday nig... nation-wide hookup.

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

Koussevitzky works as hard as the men. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black care (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

Indicative of the conductor's devotion to his art was his refusal to permit political differences to affect his musical tastes. Although a voluntary exile from Russia in 1920, he recently hailed the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Soviet Union during the second World War.

Today IN SOCIETY

Boston Globe

Hail Soviet Anthem at Symphony Hal...

Feb. 27, 1943

Roy Harris' 5th Symphony Has World Premiere

Uniforms and distinguished gues... marked the great audience th... rose at Serge Koussevitsky's e... trance to the Symphony Hall sta... yesterday, and remained standi... through the Russian national a... them, played yesterday in honor ... the 25th anniversary of the Sovi... Army.

Played also in honor of Russia... magnificent Army, to whom it ... dedicated, was Roy Harris' Fift... Symphony, which had its worl... premiere yesterday at the goo... hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and th... Symphony Orchestra.

Special guests at both the Sym... phony and the regular Frida... Symphony luncheon at the Copley ... Plaza were Capt. Stepan Panjilov... and the radio operator of his Rus... sian merchant ship, attractive littl... Lilya Bogdanova. At the luncheon ... they sat at a gala decorated Rus... sian War Relief head table and ... listened intently to their talented ... compatriot, Boris Goldovsky, as he ... illustrated his entertaining program ... talk at the piano. Still another ... distinguished guest from Russia yes... terday was the Symphony soloist ... Alexander Borovsky.

Sharing the Russian guests at the Copley luncheon were Dr. Hugh Cabot, Massachusetts head of Russian War Relief, and Mrs. Cabot, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Mrs. Alexander Samoiloff, talented artist and executive committee member of Russian War Relief; Mrs. John R. van Nagell, Mrs. George R. Faxon. Both composer Roy Harris and Mrs. Harris were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Goldovsky as were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Burgin and Mrs. Quincy Porter. Hostesses at the Copley yesterday included Mrs. Charles M. Spofford, Mrs. Channing H. Cox, Mrs. H. Parker Whittington, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith and Mrs. E. Russell Norton, and the many tables of guests included Mr. and Mrs. Aaron Richmond and Mrs. Richmond's sister, Mrs. Henry Nesburn of Los Angeles, Mrs. Henry A. Laughlin and her daughter, Mrs. David B. Rodd, whose husband, a member of the R. C. A. F., is abroad on active service, and Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs.

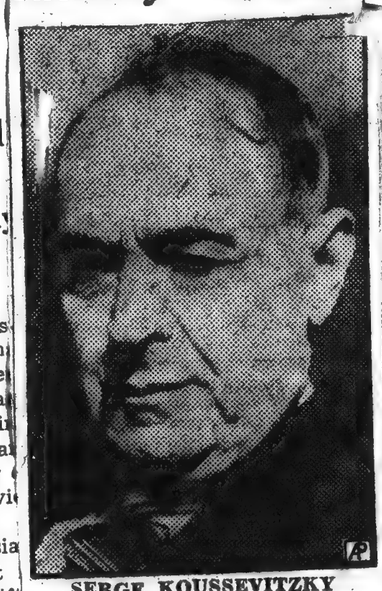
British naval officers, sailors from New Zealand and Australia, and a number of French sailors, as well as American soldiers, sailors, Coast Guardsmen and officers, lent color to the big appreciative audience.

SNAPSHOTS — Alex Williams, home yesterday on leave from Army duty, back in his old seat at Symphony again. . . The Dudley Pickmans walking over from 303 Commonwealth av. . . Mrs. Grafton Fay also among the brisk walkers, furs back everywhere in deference to the sharp cold outside. . . Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller's nice sables over a deep green suit. . . Mrs. Oliver Wolcott and Mrs. Frederick Ayer among the North Shore neighbors down by train. . . Mrs. William Morris Hunt (Rosamond Pier) in by subway from Milton, a fetching little velvet and fur hood tied over her lovely fair hair. . . Katherine Warner also in from Milton, . . Mrs. Charles F. Woodard (Gwendolen Livermore) in suave cinnamon shades, a brief veil on her little square-crowned hat. . . Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson. . . Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and her daughter, Mrs. Ernest E. Decker. . . Carol Warren. . . blonde Louise Sargent. . . Mrs. Arthur Fiedler. . . the Edward Jackson Holmes.

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

FEB 28 1943

Koussevitzky's Gestures Identify The Composition



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green Room at Symphony Hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony Hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky, conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has moulded Boston Symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 20, formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.

ABLE DIO
rocess, wiretations of con-
City is especially Rusenue hotel interest in modailable fonposers, Koussewith othes being heard tion worlcountry. Recently learn thagned a contract cted Armin Federation of lk is stilling its return to the brac...e-year lapse. Al-sunshine 5000 letters have rationedm the vast radio ve Boardistens in on the ation Bu...ation-wide hookup.
Wednesie the hours of re-trip fronary for a successful presentony Hall audiences
...ssably-dressed conduc-
...ver his musicians, and onsic from their hearts, on's bough he himself were
...le parts.
...n, however, during an ...earsal, the mild-man-becomes a shouting, ges-
...emon, demanding the from the 105 men under often getting it.
...rything goes well, he mur-
...fine, fine," and half-sits
...ns against the chair placed
...podium, his right foot keep-
...he, his arms and face mirthe music.

[43]

This Clipping From SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 28 1943

Demon Conductor Names Composition Merely By Looking At Own Photos

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green Room at Symphony Hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft, Russian-accented voice made it sound like "zee." "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behing the organ pipes at Symphony Hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky, conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has moulded the Boston Symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently, the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five year lapse. Already, more than 5,000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nationwide hookup.

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony Hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding th impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs "Fine, fine," and half sits half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly, something is wrong. The little man—actually, he's not much over five feet six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers, impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, No," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you," he asks them. "So. If you want, we do it one thousand times."

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "If you sing bad, I will drown you with the orchestra."

Koussevitzky works as hard as the men. Invariably, he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: Ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score, Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. As a 10-year-old in the little north Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

Indicative of the conductor's devotion to his art was his refusal to permit political differences to affect his musical tastes. Although a voluntary exile from Russia in 1920, he recently hailed the 25th anniversary of the Soviet Union during the Second World War.

"The greatest music of our day," he said, "is now being written in war-torn Russia. It carries a message of courage, comfort and faith amidst untold suffering and destruction."

Koussevitzky became an American citizen in 1941. Earlier, honorary doctorates were awarded him by Brown University, in 1926, by Harvard, in 1929, by Yale, Rutgers, Rochester.

At the Brown ceremony, the conductor felt that his English—then a mixture of Russian, French and German—would be inadequate to express his thanks. So, to show his appreciation, he played a solo on the double bass—and brought down the house. (As the university's president said afterward, "Dr. Koussevitzky has made the bull-fiddle sing like a nightingale.")

In his spare time, Koussevitzky walks, reads philosophy and surprisingly enough, writes, because: "I like to spoil paper. That is my relaxation between concerts."

Among the conductor's prized possessions are numerous letters from men in the armed forces. "These writings, sometimes they bring tears to my eyes," he says.

One, from Pvt. Bernard Brown, a member of the U. S. Air Force stationed at Miami, Fla., told of listening to a broadcast while on duty in barracks.

"I only wish to say that I have never enjoyed a piece of classical music played by anyone, as I did your rendition," Brown wrote. "Accept my sincerest thanks for helping a soldier pass part of a pretty lonely night."

(Wide World Photos)

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—More than 50 years of d iscipline and training has produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique of Serge Koussevitzky, world famous orchestra leader. By looking at any picture of himself conducting, he can tell what composition is being played, and here are two which he recognized as Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." He described them as: (Left)—"This is undoubtedly the beginning of Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe'—the second suite. The sound of the orchestra must be heard coming softly and suddenly out of silence." (Right)—"Culmination of a crescendo in 'Daphnis'".

The Symphony

By L. A

After the excitements of last week, with its new Roy Harris symphony and the "Internationale," it was not surprising that there should be a sense of letdown in Dr. Koussevitzky's program for this week, which consists of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, no. 10; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" Suite.

This sense was aggravated yesterday by the fact that the conductor was in one of his most perverse moods during the first half of the program, which included the Handel and Beethoven numbers. Slow movements, it seemed, had never been so slow before, nor contrasts of tempo and dynamics so violent.

All this was magnificent, so far as it was regarded as a display of virtuosity on the part of the conductor and of the orchestra; but it was not the music that had been indited by Handel and Beethoven. Handel took on a Tchaikovskyan air, and Beethoven became a medium for a display of interpretative vagaries.

The extravagances which Dr. Koussvitzky sometimes permits himself are appropriate enough to a work like Rimsky's "Schéhérazade" Suite, which is a fairy tale, full of sound and color. But with the classic masters, such methods are out of place. They make us marvel at the capacities of the orchestra, but they leave Handel and Beethoven out of the picture.

The orchestra will be away next week. The following week, Mr. Burgin will conduct in Cambridge and Boston a program which will contain Dukelsky's new Violin Concerto, for first performance, and the first part of Mahler's Symphony No. 3, for the first time heresbouts.

Springfield Union feb. 27

Boston Symphony Plays Tribute to Russian Army

Features Premiere of Harris' Fifth Symphony, Dedicated to U. S. S. R.

BOSTON, Feb. 26 (AP)—American and Russian music were joined in symbolic harmony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today during unique ceremonies which paid tribute to the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Red army and Red fleet and featured the world premiere of an American symphony dedicated to the U.S.S.R.

Honors Both Nations

The new work—the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris, 45-year-old Oklahoma composer now associated with Cornell University's music department—occupied a prominent place on a program cleverly designed to honor both nations by Serge Koussevitzky, eminent Russian-born conductor who is now an American citizen.

The Harris symphony came to Symphony Hall's concert platform after an unusual exchange of messages between the lanky American, nine Russian composers and the U.S.S.R. Society for Cultural Relations With Foreign Countries.

The Russians hoped they could hear the new work—a wish that may be granted tomorrow night when the concert is short-waved—and Harris in turn dedicated the score "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Play National Anthems

Koussevitzky began the program by dedicating the concerts—it will be repeated tomorrow night—to the "glorious Russian Army . . .We will begin with the Russian anthem." The Internationale Immediately was followed by our own National anthem.

The Harris symphony more than lived up to expectations. As typically American as the composer himself—he was born on Lincoln's Birthday in Lincoln County, Incidentally—the score mirrored the nation's feeling today in a polychordal, multi-rhythmic manner.

A martial first movement—somewhat less brilliantly original than the others—was followed by a rhapsodic choral style second section. The moving finale, in fugue form, developed into a stirring, emotion-lifting climax.

Prolonged Applause

Harris twice was called back to the platform to acknowledge prolonged applause and occasional cheers from the near-capacity audience. Finally he left the stage arm in arm with Koussevitzky. Both had spent long hours in arduous rehearsals and the magnificent performance provided fitting tribute to their combined efforts.

The program began with the playing of Bosotn-born Edward Burlingame Hill's First Symphony—Hill also was present—and ended with Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, a clever facile work typical of the best in modern Russian musical literature. It, in turn, was brilliantly interpreted by the Russian-born pianist, Alexander [illegible] and the orchestra.

hardly be considered nostalgic. The cadenza seemed a bit over-long to us. Of the three movements the waltz seemed most successful, although the final variations (also a bit over long), offered a good deal of engaging music.

Of Miss Posselt's playing, it is only possible to speak in the most glowing terms. Her bowing has always been one of the marvels, and yesterday she outdid herself in the extraordinary fluency with which she changed from up-bow to down-bow, never cutting into the phrase or interrupting the tone. As always, her technic, her intonation and her feeling for the music were little short of perfection. She is, without exaggeration, one of the more exciting performers of the day in either sex.

The concert, which was performed with all the customary excellence of ensemble under Mr. Burgin's energetic leadership, began with the fine but seldom-heard C minor symphony of Haydn. Next week's equally interesting program lists William Schuman's "A Free Song"; Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, Guarnieri's "Aberture Concertante" (the composer conducting) and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 19th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Ruth Posselt was the violin soloist in the Dukelsky Concerto. The program was as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 95, in C minor
Dukelsky.....Violin Concerto in G minor
Mahler.....Symphony No. 3 (first part)

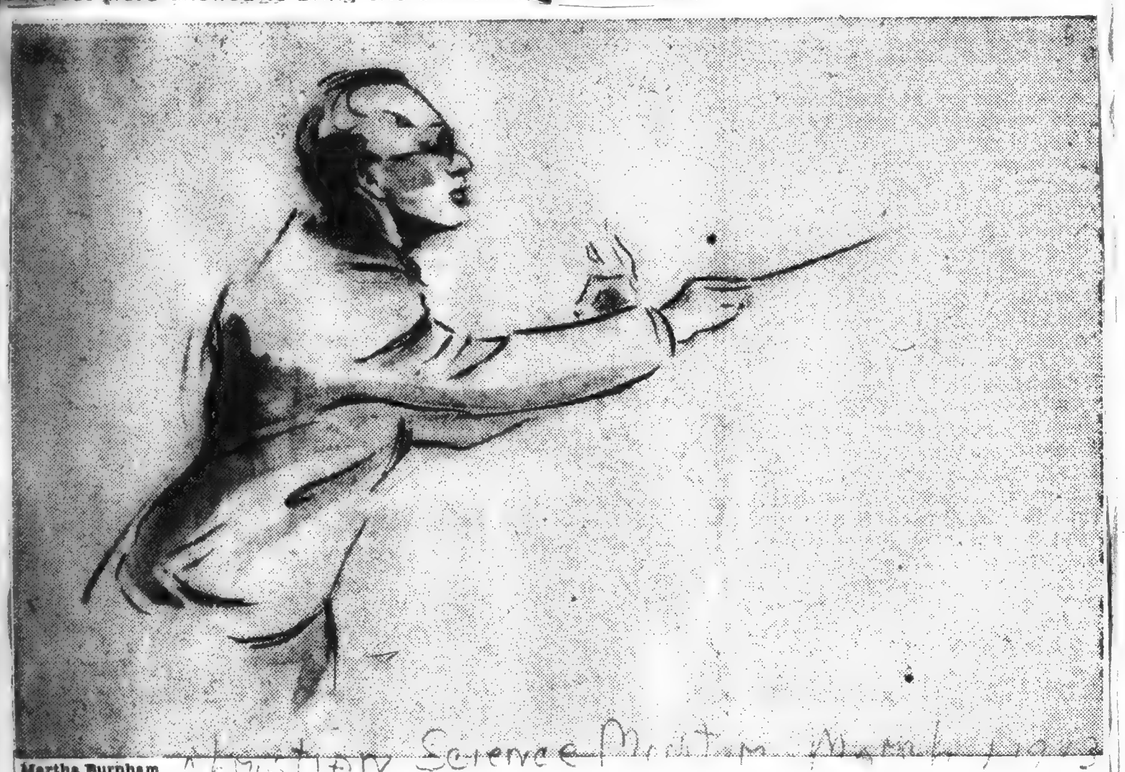
Despite the seeming severity of the reservations to follow, Vladimir Dukelsky has indeed written a violin concerto in his new G minor which may well prove "a useful vehicle for the few fine violinists in quest of something to replace the slightly shopworn warhorses of their repertoire" (to quote Mr. Dukelsky himself). For, in addition to being remarkably well suited to the tonal and technical capacities of the violin, it is a wholly pleasant composition in a modern but not, fortunately, a mathematical idiom.

Purely as music for the violin, it deserves the highest praise. Indeed, we could go so far as to state (well aware of the absurdity of it), that slightly revised and performed unaccompanied, it could stand on its own feet as a sonata for violin. It will be most interesting to see the concerto when it is published in a reduction for violin and piano, for the impression will not down that the orchestra is pure upholstery notwithstanding the cleverness of some of the sonorities, such as bass clarinet and piccolo in duet.

In any case, the orchestra is seldom employed except as a variegated backdrop to the now lyric, now soaring and now brilliant tones of the solo violin. Frequently it falters even in that capacity, and we hear, in an isolated and often pointless fashion, this voice against that one, this sonority against that. There is seldom the impression of perfect integration of orchestra and soloist. On the other hand, it is quite possible the composer meant it to be that way. After all, there is no reason he shouldn't write a concerto in the original sense of the term as a showpiece for violin. It's just unexpected in these days, for it has long been proved that people can play the violin magnificently. Miss Posselt, for instance.

As for its musical material, that is another matter. It is frequently exceptionally pleasing, and it must be said it made its way readily with the audience, which applauded the composer as no other has been this season. The lyric theme of the first movement could almost have been written by a Rachmmaninoff, but its unconventional development could

NATIONAL ANTHEM OPENS CONCERT—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, led 2000 servicemen and women, including WAVES, WAACS, women Marines, French, English and Australian servicemen in the singing of the national anthem yesterday to open the concert at Symphony Hall for members of the armed forces. Members of military services were allowed to bring one civilian each with them.



Martha Burnham

Georg Szell, Sketched at Rehearsal

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight and tomorrow afternoon.

SYMPHONY BILL QUITE EVENTFUL

Haydn, Dukelsky, Wahler Represented

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Eventful is the word for this week's pair of Symphony concerts, conducted by Richard Burgin. The first portion of the programme consists of Haydn's C minor Symphony, No. 95, unheard at Symphony Hall since 1916, and Vladimir Dukelsky's violin concerto, which received its first public performance at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening with Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Burgin) as soloist. Also new to Boston yesterday was the remaining item on the list, the long first movement of Mahler's huge Third Symphony.

Vladimir Dukelsky occupies a unique position in the contemporary musical scene. As "Vernon Duke" he writes musical comedies and music for the films and next Tuesday evening he will enjoy another world premiere when his "Dancing in the Streets" is brought out at the Shubert Theatre.

It is natural to look for traces of Duke in the music of Dukelsky. The third movement of the concerto, a theme and variations, affords a glimpse or two, and the middle movement, a waltz, is at least free from seriousness though it avoids the commonplace. The first movement, the soundest of the three, is pure Dukelsky.

But the latter by his own admission has no time for musical abstractions and the first two sections of this concerto have abundant charm and should commend themselves to the violinist eager for new material. On a first hearing the variations seemed fabricated and musically hardly worth the enormous trouble to which they put the solo player. Miss Posselt acquitted herself nobly here and elsewhere and there was great applause for her as well as for the composer, who looked very smart in his coast guard uniform.

Mr. Burgin has worked faithfully for Mahler hereabouts but he did that perplexing composer some disservice by isolating this movement in the first place and putting it at the end of a programme in the second. To be sure, Mahler called this movement "part one" and lumped the other five as "part two," but its effect is that of a sort of vast preluding and it is bound to make a very different and far more satisfactory impression when heard as he intended it.

Heavily scored on the brass side, it provides a field day for horns, trumpets and trombones and there was much virtuoso playing yesterday. The movement abounds in remarkable orchestral effects that range, Mahler-like, from the beautiful to the bizarre. Its general tenor is martial, now cheerful, now funeral and, like most else that Mahler wrote, it cannot be appraised just as music. There is mysticism here with man and nature as its theme. Though the thread of the composer's discourse is at times hard to follow there is a rousing conclusion which yesterday brought down at least a large proportion of the house—there will be dissenting opinions over Mahler until the end of time.

When all is said, Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for giving us even this much of the Symphony and he is to be warmly commended for restoring to us the fine Symphony of Haydn which shows that genial symphonist in a somewhat more serious light. Yesterday it set the keynote for an afternoon of beautiful playing.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
APR 2- 1943

"Isle of the Dead" Is Played In Memory of Rachmaninoff

By Edward O'Gorman

The music played during the past week in memory of the late Sergei Rachmaninoff provides a revealing commentary on the pervading potency of the Russian pianist's rather somber, melancholy character. There has been no parade of the dead march from "Saul" and the Chopin funeral march. There was a need for something more fitting, something more typical of the man and the artist. Fritz Reiner, in an inspired moment, chose the last movement—the Adagio Lamentoso—of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony in his concert two nights ago with the Philharmonic-Symphony. Sergei Koussevitzky, in his program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, came a little closer to the ideal commemoration of a unique personality when he played the Russian composer's own tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead."

The tone-poem followed Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso for strings and preceded Aaron Copland's new "A Lincoln Portrait" and the Symphony No. 5 of Shostakovich.

"The Isle of the Dead" has been a long time on the shelf despite its singular and sometimes novel character. Like all of Rachmaninoff's music it is couched in a romantic idiom, an expiring idiom which Rachmaninoff managed to maintain single-handed for more years than the oldest of us can remember; but like all his music it has timeless qualities, a vigorous, individual style of invention, a strong sense of musical independence. Dr. Koussevitzky, visibly touched, conducted the music affectingly.

Copland's Music

Of all the Lincoln pieces that have been written, Aaron Copland's is probably the simplest and the most effective. The music is based chiefly on two contrasting American tunes, the lively "Camptown Races" and the more evocative "Springfield Mountain." The most striking feature of the work is the use of a speaker—last night it was Will Geer—who intones short, characteristic remarks of Lincoln. It was this, undoubtedly that contributed most to the effectiveness of the music last night. When Mr. Geer, tall, gangling, in a voice touched with a homely accent, said, "As I would not be a slave, so would I not be a master; and this is my idea of democracy," you could have heard a pin drop. You could also hear Copland's music, which is always neat, properly reserved for its particular purpose, and strong in personality.

This Clipping From
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER
MAR 4 - 1943 34

Koussevitzky Plans Future of Music Center

Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions.

"But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music.

"It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Thus Dr. Koussevitzky spoke as he announced that, although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to temporarily suspend its activities.

PLANS TO RE-OPEN

Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment, the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons.

It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAR 3 1943

Berkshire Music Center Suspended for This Year

The 1943 season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will be suspended, according to an announcement received today from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the [redacted] Music Foundation and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In making the announcement, Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

He added that although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to temporarily suspend its activities.

Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the Center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment the Center will resume its activities.

[45]

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

MAR 6 1943

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER CLOSED FOR THE DURATION

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced today that owing to war conditions the Berkshire Music Center will be temporarily closed, despite the fact that a committee of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation had been formulating plans for continuing the Center the coming season.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," said the noted conductor. "But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help, and inspiration."

Plans For Reopening

Plans, however, already are progressing for the reopening of the Center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

At the earliest possible moment the Center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

* * *

Patriotic Song Entries Surge In For Contest

A steady stream of entries and inquiries from soldiers, sailors, and marines, and from civilians representing every age group from school children to octogenarians, has followed the announcement of a patriotic song contest sponsored jointly by the National Broadcasting Company and the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Judges of the contest, including Leopold Stokowski, Lawrence Tibbett, Major Howard Bronson, and Ernest LaPrade, find themselves with a man-sized job in choosing a patriotic song of outstanding merit for a world premier on the N. B. C. network during National Music Week, May 2 to 8.

Convinced that the right song appearing at the right time would be a definite contribution to the war effort, the sponsors have thrown open competition to any resident of the United States. Words and music, of 2 to 3 minutes performing time, should be mailed to Rhea Silberta, 200 West 57th Street, New York City, under a nom de plume. Idendity of the composer must be kept secret. Each manuscript must be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing full name and address of the composer and brief biographical details such as date and place of birth, musical education, and a list of compositions published or publicly performed. No composition may be submitted which has been previously published, publicly performed under professional auspices, or awarded a prize in any competition. The contest closes March 31.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 7

Berkshire Music Festival Called Off During War

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced Saturday that although members of the boards of the orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center this coming summer, it has been "reluctantly decided" to suspend its activities owing to the war.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that "cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, and especially for music."

MUSIC

Mar 6

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After the excitements of the Russo-American festivities at Symphony Hall—which last week provided one of the most stimulating concerts of the season—the Boston Symphony Orchestra has this week returned to a program of sober familiarity.

There are works by three composers: Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" Suite. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

A Handel Concerto Grosso is invariably a demonstration of the wonders of the Boston string section. All those wonders were present yesterday: the incredibly rich clear and deep tone, the extreme polish of ensemble (which means they all keep rigorously together and the different sections play virtually as one instrument). Flexibility and a dynamic range from the merest wisp of tone to a fortissimo of astonishing power are other treasurable qualities of the Boston strings.

Apart from one or two minor blemishes, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony was accorded a beautiful performance—fleeting, precise and very expressive. Beethoven is one of the composers whom Mr. Koussevitzky performs with something of a supersuper intensity and style. He makes the music "sing" all the way.

In view of such re-creative accomplishment, it is probably an invitation to be mobbed to suggest that the Fourth, no matter how fine its quality, is perhaps the least interesting, comparatively, of all the Beethoven nine symphonies.

This is not said casually; the First and Second are remarkable because of the departure they show from the formalism of the 18th Century; the Third, Fifth and Ninth are vast, dynamic masterpieces, and so, in its light-hearted way, is the Seventh. The "Pastoral" is unique, and the Eighth differs from all its fellows. But the Fourth? Call it one of the valleys rather than one of the peaks of Beethoven's genius.

"Scheherazade" replaced the previously scheduled Fifth Symphony of Glazunoff, which pleased this chronicler immensely, since he must honestly count Glazunoff as one of the talented but uninspired amateurs of music.

There were some comments that "Scheherazade" had become dulled by too frequent hearings. Perhaps so, but the lavish color, the suggestion of Oriental mystery and the sheer gorgeous sound of Rimsky-Korsakoff's pictorial score are things of which one listener, at least, does not tire.

The performance was fully in the Koussevitzky tradition. It built up to a towering climax in the section depicting the ship dashed against the "rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior." In the preceding three movements the orchestra was also in best form and so was the conductor. Mr. Burgin played the involved violin solo admirably.—C. W. D.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

MAR 6 1943

Berkshire Center Suspends Activities

BOSTON, March 6—The Berkshire Music Center, owing to war conditions will suspend its activities temporarily, it was announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, who stated that although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the center this summer, it has been deemed inadvisable to do so.

Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nationwide interest and support. At the earliest time the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

VARIETY AGAIN BY SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakov, Handel and Beethoven Presented

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The conductor of a symphony orchestra must consider many and often widely divergent tastes, many degrees of musical aptitude and experience. Some are restive under the new, others are restless under the old. Perhaps it is best to mix the two, and Dr. Koussevitzky often does that very thing. In his last two programmes, however, he has gone from one extreme to the other. A week ago he had Hill, Harris and Prokofieff. This week we are getting Handel, Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov.

The works by which these last-named masters are represented on this current Boston Symphony list are the Concerto Grosso for strings in D minor, (Opus 6, No. 10), the Fourth Symphony and "Scheherazade." Where "Scheherazade" now stands, Glazounov's Fifth Symphony, unheard here since 1913, originally stood, and for that matter the Handel-Beethoven combination is a substitute for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which had been announced a fortnight ago.

Reports from the rehearsal room had it that the Glazounov had been run through the first of the week and was found to have sadly aged. The Rimsky-Korsakov suite, now practically Pop Concert material and a showpiece par excellence for our orchestra, was probably relished by most of yesterday's listeners and will be received as cordially tonight. The radio audience does not get it, since it comes after the intermission.

One cannot say that Beethoven's Fourth has been played to death here of late. The last previous performance in Symphony Hall was in April, 1938. Those who can look at Beethoven dispassionately are apt to find the symphony inferior to most of its companions, if not indeed to all of them. The enlivening first movement with its serenely beautiful introduction chiefly commends it, Dr. Koussevitzky has always been happy in his interpretation of the work, but only a virtuoso orchestra could play the finale at the pace he assigned to it yesterday.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 8 1943

MUSIC

Harris' Fifth

Most prolific living writer of symphon is Russia's Nicolai Yokovlevich Miaskovsky, who at 61 has already written 23 a is still going strong. Finland's Jean Sibel and another Russian, Dmitri Shostakovi may be longer on quality, but they have their long lives written only seven sy phonies apiece. In the U.S., rangy, Ok homa-born, 45-year-old Roy Harris le the field. Last week his Fifth Symph (the first Fifth by any U.S. native, liv or dead) was premièred by Boston's Se Koussevitsky and broadcast the follov night over the Blue Network.

Boston critics thought up various c ments. The Boston Herald's Rudolph Jr. managed this: "It may even be tha is the first truly indigenous compositio any lasting significance; there are tl who smell . . . the more intimate tails of American agriculture in its tures."

Like most Harris symphonies, the F was prefaced by an elaborate pronou ment by Harris explaining its deep r tion to life, destiny and the U.S. soil. composers have so relied on words to their music. Short-waved by NBC to Russia and South America, the symphony was dedicated to "the heroic people of the Soviet Union," and played in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Red Army. The new work was stormy and large in scale. It did not seem likely to disturb either of the two kinds of Harris listeners: 1) devotees, who see in Harris' rugged themes a reflection of the energy and spaciousness of U.S. life; 2) skeptics like blind Pianist Alex Templeton, who thought Harris' Third Symphony sounded "like a lot of people moving furniture around."

Herbert Gehr

COMPOSER HARRIS
In Boston, they smelt something.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 7

BERKSHIRE SUSPENSION

ALTHOUGH a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation were formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., this Summer, it has been decided to temporarily suspend its activities, owing to war conditions, according to an announcement made by Serge Koussevitzky, founder and director of the school.

Plans, however, are being made to reopen the center as soon as war conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

Post-War Plans

"After this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience with a greater need and appreciation of the arts and especially for music," Dr. Koussevitzky declared. "It is for us to use this time to prepare now that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

In view of the temporary suspension of the center it is to be assumed that there will be no public concerts this Summer at Tanglewood.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

MAR 7 1943

Berkshire Festival Suspends for Duration

Boston, Mass., March 6.—"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with ever greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Thus Dr. Koussevitzky spoke as he announced although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to temporarily suspend its activities.

Reopening Planned

Plans are progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nationwide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment, the center will resume activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 7 1943

Berkshire Music School Won't Open

Boston, March 6—(AP)—Latest war casualty in the cultural field is Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire music center at Lenox, Mass. No session will be held at the famous school this year, Dr. Koussevitzky announced today.

The committee which up to today was planning for reopening the center has transferred its interest to plans for a first post-war season.

Although the well known Berkshire symphonic festival was cancelled last summer, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to conduct his six-weeks school, and in addition to provide three week-ends of concerts by using the student orchestra developed under his direction in the music center.

But additional restrictions this year make it impossible to care for the 300-odd students, and transportation difficulties prohibit a concert series in a district where motor car transportation must be relied upon almost exclusively.

MARCH NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE 7 43

Berkshire Music Center Shut

BOSTON, March 6 (AP).—Latest war casualty in the cultural field is Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass. No session will be held at the famous school this year, Dr. Koussevitzky announced today. The committee which until today was planning for the reopening of the center has transferred its interest to plans for the first post-war season.

This Clipping From SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

MAR 8 1943

Moment

A COMMITTEE composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation has decided, owing to war conditions, to suspend temporarily the activities of the Berkshire Music Center. Dr. Koussevitzky, in commenting on the suspension of the 1943 season, declared:

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, depended by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Plans are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the

Musicale

By Maud L. Welin

N. McDavitt, Mrs. Wilbur Sanders, Mrs. James W. Gray, Mrs. F. A. Hamilton jr., Mrs. J. L. Harvey, Mrs. Stanley Du Mond and Mrs. Leonard Fifer.

Others attending were Mrs. Eugene H. Ashley, Miss Irene Cooley, Mrs. W. A. Getty, Mrs. Clayton Matney, Mrs. P. J. McManus, Mrs. Burt Newkirk, Mrs. A. G. Rutherford, Mrs. E. Darrell Schneider, Mrs. George Watson and Mrs. Alexander Wilkie.

[46]

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
MAR 6 1943

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER CLOSED FOR THE DURATION

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced today that owing to war conditions the Berkshire Music Center will be temporarily closed, despite the fact that a committee of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation had been formulating plans for continuing the Center the coming season.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," said the noted conductor. "But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help, and inspiration."

Plans For Reopening

Plans, however, already are progressing for the reopening of the Center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

At the earliest possible moment the Center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

* * *

Patriotic Song Entries Surge In For Contest

A steady stream of entries and inquiries from soldiers, sailors, and marines, and from civilians representing every age group from school children to octogenarians, has followed the announcement of a patriotic song contest sponsored jointly by the National Broadcasting Company and the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Judges of the contest, including Leopold Stokowski, Lawrence Tibbett, Major Howard Bronson, and Ernest LaPrade, find themselves with a man-sized job in choosing a patriotic song of outstanding merit for a world premier on the N. B. C. network during National Music Week, May 2 to 8.

Convinced that the right song appearing at the right time would be a definite contribution to the war effort, the sponsors have thrown open competition to any resident of the United States. Words and music, of 2 to 3 minutes performing time, should be mailed to Rhea Silberta, 200 West 57th Street, New York City, under a nom de plume. Identity of the composer must be kept secret. Each manuscript must be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing full name and address of the composer and brief biographical details such as date and place of birth, musical education, and a list of compositions published or publicly performed. No composition may be submitted which has been previously published, publicly performed under professional auspices, or awarded a prize in any competition. The contest closes March 31.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 7 - 1943

Berkshire Music Festival Called Off During War

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced Saturday that although members of the boards of the orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center this coming summer, it has been "reluctantly decided" to suspend its activities owing to the war.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that "cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, and especially for music.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
MAR 6 1943

Berkshire Center Suspends Activities

BOSTON, March 6—The Berkshire Music Center, owing to war conditions will suspend its activities temporarily, it was announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who stated that a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the center this summer, it has been deemed inadvisable to do so.

"Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nationwide interest and support. At the earliest time the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

After the excitements of the Russo-American festivities at Symphony Hall—which last week provided one of the most stimulating concerts of the season—the Boston Symphony Orchestra has this week returned to a program of sober familiarity.

There are works by three composers: Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" Suite. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

A Handel Concerto Grosso is invariably a demonstration of the wonders of the Boston string section. All those wonders were present yesterday: the incredibly rich clear and deep tone, the extreme polish of ensemble (which means they all keep rigorously together and the different sections play virtually as one instrument). Flexibility and a dynamic range from the merest wisp of tone to a fortissimo of astonishing power are other treasurable qualities of the Boston strings.

Apart from one or two minor blemishes, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony was accorded a beautiful performance—fleeting, precise and very expressive. Beethoven is one of the composers whom Mr. Koussevitzky performs with something of a super-super intensity and style. He makes the music "sing" all the way.

In view of such re-creative accomplishment, it is probably an invitation to be mobbed to suggest that the Fourth, no matter how fine its quality, is perhaps the least interesting, comparatively, of all the Beethoven nine symphonies.

This is not said casually; the First and Second are remarkable because of the departure they show from the formalism of the 18th Century; the Third, Fifth and Ninth are vast, dynamic masterpieces, and so, in its light-hearted way, is the Seventh. The "Pastoral" is unique, and the Eighth differs from all its fellows. But the Fourth? Call it one of the valleys rather than one of the peaks of Beethoven's genius.

"Scheherazade" replaced the previously scheduled Fifth Symphony of Glazunoff, which pleased this chronicler immensely, since he must honestly count Glazunoff as one of the talented but uninspired amateurs of music.

There were some comments that "Scheherazade" had become dulled by too frequent hearings. Perhaps so, but the lavish color, the suggestion of Oriental mystery and the sheer gorgeous sound of Rimsky-Korsakoff's pictorial score are things of which one listener, at least, does not tire.

The performance was fully in the Koussevitzky tradition. It built up to a towering climax in the section depicting the ship dashed against the "rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior." In the preceding three movements the orchestra was also in best form and so was the conductor. Mr. Burgin played the involved violin solo admirably.—C. W. D.

VARIETY AGAIN BY SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakov, Handel and Beethoven Presented

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The conductor of a symphony orchestra must consider many and often widely divergent tastes, many degrees of musical aptitude and experience. Some are restive under the new, others are restless under the old. Perhaps it is best to mix the two, and Dr. Koussevitzky often does that very thing. In his last two programmes, however, he has gone from one extreme to the other. A week ago he had Hill, Harris and Prokofieff. This week we are getting Handel, Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov.

The works by which these last-named masters are represented on this current Boston Symphony list are the Concerto Grosso for strings in D minor, (Opus 6, No. 10), the Fourth Symphony and "Scheherazade." Where "Scheherazade" now stands, Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, unheard here since 1918, originally stood, and for that matter the Handel-Beethoven combination is a substitute for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which had been announced a fortnight ago.

Reports from the rehearsal room had it that the Glazounoff had been run through the first of the week and was found to have sadly aged. The Rimsky-Korsakov suite, now practically Pop Concert material and a showpiece par excellence for our orchestra, was probably relished by most of yesterday's listeners and will be received as cordially tonight. The radio audience does not get it, since it comes after the intermission.

One cannot say that Beethoven's Fourth has been played to death here of late. The last previous performance in Symphony Hall was in April, 1938. Those who can look at Beethoven dispassionately are apt to find the symphony inferior to most of its companions, if not indeed to all of them. The enlivening first movement with its scarcely beautiful introduction chiefly commends it. Dr. Koussevitzky has always been happy in his interpretation of the work, but only a virtuoso orchestra could play the finale at the pace he assigned to it yesterday.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
MAR 8 - 1943

MUSIC

Harris' Fifth

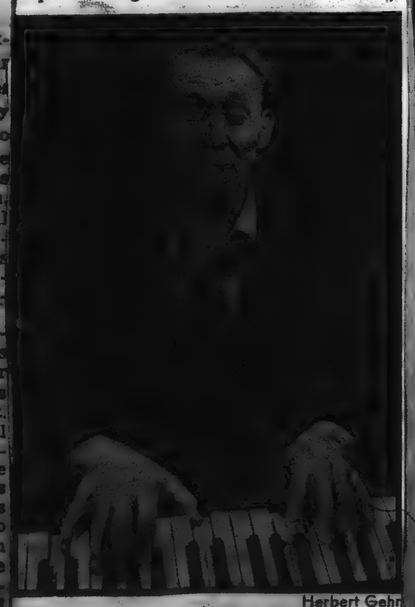
Most prolific living writer of symphonies is Russia's Nicolai Yokovlevich Miaskovsky, who at 61 has already written 23 and is still going strong. Finland's Jean Sibelius and another Russian, Dmitri Shostakovich, may be longer on quality, but they have in their long lives written only seven symphonies apiece. In the U.S., rangy, Oklahoma-born, 45-year-old Roy Harris leads the field. Last week his Fifth Symphony (the first Fifth by any U.S. native, living or dead) was premièred by Boston's Sergei Koussevitsky and broadcast the following night over the Blue Network.

Boston critics thought up various comments. The Boston Herald's Rudolph Elie Jr. managed this: "It may even be that it is the first truly indigenous composition of any lasting significance; there are those who smell . . . the more intimate details of American agriculture in its textures."

Like most Harris symphonies, the F was prefaced by an elaborate pronouncement by Harris explaining its deep relation to life, destiny and the U.S. soil. Few composers have so relied on words to plug their music. Short-waved by NBC to Russia and South America, the symphony was dedicated to "the heroic people of the Soviet Union," and played in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Red Army. The new work was stormy and large in scale. It did not seem likely to disturb either of the two kinds of Harris listeners: 1) devotees, who see in Harris' rugged themes a reflection of the energy and spaciousness of U.S. life; 2) skeptics like blind Pianist Alex Templeton, who thought Harris' Third Symphony sounded "like a lot of people moving furniture around."



Herbert Gehr

COMPOSER HARRIS
In Boston, they smell something.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 7 1943

Berkshire Music Center Shut

BOSTON, March 6 (AP).—Latest war casualty in the cultural field is Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass. No session will be held at the famous school this year, Dr. Koussevitzky announced today. The committee which until today was planning for the reopening of the center has transferred its interest to plans for the first post-war season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 7 - 1943

BERKSHIRE SUSPENSION

ALTHOUGH a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation were formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., this Summer, it has been decided to temporarily suspend its activities, owing to war conditions, according to an announcement made by Serge Koussevitzky, founder and director of the school.

Plans, however, are being made to reopen the center as soon as war conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

Post-War Plans

"After this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience with a greater need and appreciation of the arts and especially for music," Dr. Koussevitzky declared. "It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

In view of the temporary suspension of the center it is to be assumed that there will be no public concerts this Summer at Tanglewood.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
MAR 7 - 1943

March
Re
The re ear-old ating was disc ably dis memor opera-just h
Victor
ing: me year 626t
Cha Un res be ti w s
Mass., cation a ssarily b rections.
sacrifice,
rific conce
e tasks of t f all ages, ill turn to ter and other epened by th with a greater n for the for music. It time to prepare shall stand ready t d with ever greate r usefulness, help an
"
r. Koussevitzky spoke uno although e composed of membe ards of the Boston Symrchestra, the Berkshire
Festival and the Kous-Music Foundation have ulating plans for cone Berkshire Music Center
g summer, it has been decided, owing to war to temporarily suspend g Planned
re progressing for re-
e center as soon as war permit, and for assuring ance on the basis of naterest and support. At t possible moment, the resume activities with ished faculty and with high standards set in easons. It will thus cone its service in offering oppor-ities to young musicians, and an important part in reg the skill of many who temporarily to lay aside al work, and in restorto its rightful place in fe.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
Republican
MAR 7 1943

Berkshire Music School Won't Open

Boston, March 6—(AP)—Latest war casualty in the cultural field is Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire music [illegible] at Lenox, Mass. No session will be held at the famous school this year, Dr. Koussevitzky announced today.

The committee which up to today was planning for reopening the center has transferred its interest to plans for a first post-war season.

Although the well known Berkshire symphonic festival was cancelled last summer, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to conduct his six-weeks school, and in addition to provide three week-ends of concerts by using the student orchestra developed under his direction in the music center.

But additional restrictions this year make it impossible to care for the 300-odd students, and transportation difficulties prohibit a concert series in a district where motor car transportation must be relied upon almost exclusively.

This Clipping From SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
MAR 8 1943

Moment

A COMMITTEE composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation has decided, owing to war conditions, to suspend temporarily the activities of the Berkshire Music Center. Dr. Koussevitzky, in commenting on the suspension of the 1943 season, declared:

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Plans are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the

Musicale

By Mimi L. Welin

N. McDavitt, Mrs. Wilbur Sanders, Mrs. James W. Gray, Mrs. F. A. Hamilton jr., Mrs. J. L. Harvey, Mrs. Stanley Du Mond and Mrs. Leonard Pifer.

Others attending were Mrs. Eugene H. Ashley, Miss Irene Cooley, Mrs. W. A. Getty, Mrs. Clayton Matney, Mrs. P. J. McManus, Mrs. Burt Newkirk, Mrs. A. G. Rutherford, Mrs. E. Darrell Schneider, Mrs. George Watson and Mrs. Alexander Wilkie.

[46]

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR

Koussevitsky Program To Omit Martinu Work

Blackout Interrupted Symphony at Last Concert—More Familiar Selections to Be Played This Week

As noted in last week's column, the current season in this city is nearing its close. There remain only two more New Haven Symphony concerts in the Monday evening series besides the Young Peoples' concerts.

And this Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will formally close the Woolsey Hall Series. Comprised of 110 musicians, the orchestra will play an unusually interesting program arranged by their conductor Serge Koussevitzky. Opening the evening will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Opus 6, No. 10 in D minor, to be followed by the First Symphony of Robert Schumann, the "Spring" Symphony. The latter half of the program consists of two works by Debussy, the "Afternoon of a Faun" and "La Mer."

To many concert-goers here the omission of the Martinu Symphony which was to have been repeated this week will be a disappointment. Dr. Koussevitzky felt that the Martinu work is not compatible with the general unity of the program he has planned for this Wednesday's concert, so has chosen to leave it out of the program.

Was Third Performance

Now that the concert halls here are duly prepared against blackouts, let it be hoped that no more deletions from programs be necessary. It was unfortunate that the lesson had to be learned at the third world performance of a contemporary work, but there is still hope of hearing the symphony here, it has been suggested.

Dr. Koussevitzky sanctions the work very highly, speaking particularly of the third movement, which we were not so fortunate to have heard. Perhaps another program by this orchestra may include the symphony when its spirit fits the particular selection made. It is more or less commonly said that endorsement of a work by this eminent conductor practically guarantees the fact that the work will be heard again.

For 10 years conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky, it may be said, requires either of two characteristics of an orchestral score. It must possess that intangible quality, beauty, or it must challenge interest.

Once convinced that the composition possesses one of these qualities, Koussevitzky fairly flames with enthusiasm for it. He works at rehearsal until he gets the orchestra at "white heat over it."

The intensity of a final rehearsal is recaptured by Koussevitzky in public performance to such a degree that the audience inevitably feels his interest enkindled.

Next Winter's Series

Contrary to usual procedure the announcement of the 1943-1944 Woolsey Hall Concert Series will probably not be made until early in the fall. It has been customary in the past few years to make the plans for the new season known at the last concert of the old. In instituting this plan for announcing the series in the fall, the management is reverting to former methods.

Among the reasons for this change are the many difficulties of transportation that have been in evidence particularly since the beginning of this year. The management of the series feels that a later announcement will be more feasible at this time.

An event of great interest to youngsters as well as to oldsters is to take place this Friday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House when the second Junior performance of the season is to be given. School children between the ages of 12 to 18 will form the audience of several thousand alert youngsters to journey from this state and from various points in New York to hear Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro."

Primed by their teachers in the glories of grand opera and in the music and libretto of the particular work to be heard, the children's audience is always among the most intelligent and appreciative of the Metropolitan Opera House audiences.

According to the Opera News, published by the Metropolitan Opera Guild each week during the opera season, and we quote with permission, 'ever since the experimental "Aida" in March, 1937, the Opera Guild has developed its program of Junior Performances, which have numbered 15 to date.' Since the time of the printing of this information, there has been another performance added to the list, since on January 29 Mozart's

Must Limit Sale

In the past two years, demand for seats for these Junior Performances has been so great that the Guild reports having to limit the sale to schools which have undertaken a Group Membership in the Opera Guild, "giving preference to communities where the Guild organization is most active."

Since the Foote School has a group membership with Mrs. Stella Nahum as music advisor and chaperon for the excursions to the metropolis, New Haven was represented at the performance of the Magic Flute in January.

Musically speaking, the Opera Guild's experiment several years ago is a great success. Avid listeners who have been schooled in the merits of opera and who know what to expect in the story take their opera with a cheer. At these performances they see on the stage embodiments of the spirit they have embibed through recordings, lectures and other school activities aimed at preparing them for the occasion.

Financially speaking, the Junior Performances operate through the Metropolitan Opera Guild which purchases the performance chosen by its educational advisory committee and which sells the seats at prices ranging from 35 cents to $2. The difference is made up through underwriting supplied by the sale of boxes, contributions and a certain percentage of membership dues.

HARRIS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE AT SMITH COLLEGE

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work First Heard Last Month—Fantasia, Scheherazade Also Heard

Northampton, March 9—The Smith college 1942-1943 concert series came to an impressive close at John M. Greene hall tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

It was not only the brilliance of the orchestra that made the final concert memorable but also the performance of the Roy Harris 5th Symphony which had its world premier in Symphony hall in Boston on February 27. Whether one found this work exciting or boring, it was at least refreshing to hear a work before musical pundits had catalogued it and tucked it safely away.

As in Boston, there must have been a sharp division on the merits of the work at John M. Greene tonight. For this reviewer, the work possessed power, originality and musical direction. If there were moments of doubt, they came in the second and third movements for the first-term. "Prelude" by the composer—carried certain conviction and purposefulne that the other movements—Chora and Dance Fugue—lacked. There wa something excitingly elemental about the Prelude that contrasted sharply with the intellectualism of the Chorale and the formal preoccupation of the Dance Fugue.

The new Harris symphony, introduced by Dr Koussevitzky during the week that marked the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Russian red army, has been dedicated by the composer to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Tonigh's program opened with a stunning performance of Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-string orchestra. If there were any anticipatory qualms about hearing two moderns on one program, they were dispelled by the melodic charm of this work as transmitted by the finest orchestral string section in the country. The final work was the Rimsky-Korsakov symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was impressive from the point of view of the virtuosity of the orchestra and the solo work of the concertmaster, Richard Burgin. From the musical point of view, however, it was like being on a merry-go-round with the brass ring coming up every five times around.

MILTON BERLINER.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN Reprint
MAR 8 1943

OVERTONES

Berkshire Music Center To Suspend

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music center, announced Saturday that the board of directors of the Koussevitzky Music foundation had decided "reluctantly" to suspend the activities of the center due to the war.

In his announcement, the noted conductor said that "cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But, after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially of music."

Born at the brink of the war, the center managed to carry on for three years, although last year it was felt that opening of the center was inadvisable in view of the certain slackening of audiences for the festival period due to fuel rationing, and the number of young men in the armed services.

Dr. Koussevitzky, however, whose dream for years had been the establishment of such a cultural center in this country, was not to be deterred so easily. He formed the Koussevitzky Music foundation which financed and directed the center last year with sufficient funds to cover any deficits remaining at the end of the summer term. The Boston Symphony orchestra, which had directed the center during its first two seasons and was on hand for the festival programs, remained out of the picture, with the exception of certain leading musicians on the faculty last year.

Student Orchestra Proved Sensation

The student orchestra, comprised of highly trained and carefully selected instrumentalists from all over the country, proved one of the major musical sensations of 1942. Even the most wary person in the festival audience was frankly surprised at the talent, ability and professional calibre of the orchestra which performed for three week-ends difficult festival programs which varied little from the offerings of the veteran Boston orchestra.

People, already Berkshire-minded, attended the concerts in large numbers. if not in droves that had marked the two previous seasons. They arrived on bicycles and horseback, in passenger cars fileed to capacity with share-your-ride occupants. Buses transported additional hundreds from the nearby railroad station at Pittsfield.

That the move was taken this year, and the official declaration of its closing made by the conductor, is evidence that conditions could not be altered or confronted in any satisfactory way to merit the opening of the center.

That it will open again is an almost sure post-war possibility. Dr. Koussevitzky's great work, which made the center possible, has become an incentive to hundreds of center students already, students so imbued with the importance and value of the work accomplished there and the experience gained through close contact with leading authorities in every field of musical endeavour, that they will not see the center die. This is equally true of the men who have served on the faculty as well as the controlling boards of directors. It is also equally true of the thousands who have experienced the thrill of hearing great music presented by great musicians in a background of the great beauty of the Berkshire hills.

Center Has Exerted Wide Influence

Already, in its mere three years of existence, the center has exerted a wide influence in the musical life of America. One important step was the formation of the advanced student orchestra which led to the performing festival orchestra last year. Because of the excellence of the work, it was brought up this year that such a band, made up entirely of highly trained servicemen, might do for the Army camps what the show, "This Is the Army" did toward morale. Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times, highly endorsed such an organization in view of his knowledge of the success of the center orchestra. And he was not alone. Critics and musicians, servicemen and Army officers, endorsed the suggestion. Such an organization may yet come into being.

The effects of the center on many persons cannot be told as tangibly, but they are as real. Although the gates of the Tanglewood estate in Stockbridge are not open this summer, one center will still be alive, in the hearts and thoughts of all who have known its great and lasting gifts. It is the hope and faith of thousands that the gates will open soon again.

CELINE KOESTER.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussvitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6 No. 10
Beethoven..Symphony no. 4 in B flat Op. 60
Rimsky-Korsakov..''Scheherazade,'' Op, 35

Every once in a while a program comes along about which there virtually nothing whatever to said. Yesterday's was such a o It was a good, conventional conce of old favorites and it was play with all the orchestra's well-know virtuosity of ensemble and beauty tone.

The Handel gave the string s tion its opportunity to demonstr its incredible achievements of norority and unity. The Air seem to have been taken too slow throughout for its own good, and t accelerando in the final Alleg seemed to have been Dr. Koussevi ky's idea rather than Handel's. b it must be said it was a rather go one. At any rate, it supplied a fin piquant effect, and Handel himse would have been delighted with it.

The Beethoven gave the conducto his opportunity to supply just th proper catalyst to bring this dream est of all Beethoven Symphonies semblance of interest. In no othe of that composer's symphonies oc cur so many repetitious passages, s many stylistic frills and so man minor crises. It never quite fulfil the promise of its awesome openin adagio, and while the slow mov ment remains a song of the utmo nobility and serenity, everything el seems pretty quaint.

That this opinion is shared b practically no one else was obviou for its performance brought a fin round of applause. And the opinio was shared least of all by the con ductor, whose convictions were neve more eloquently stated in terms o orchestral interpretation. He sough out every nuance and every subtlet of balance, yet never whipped u tempos or dynamic climaxes not i keeping with the character of th music. It was unquestionably wholly authoritative performanc to the last detail.

The Rimsky-Korsakov allowe both orchestra and conductor to re move the spigot, and the resultin cataract of sound was definitel something to hear. The perform ance abounded in elan throughout which actually made this beguiling, over-familiar nonsense exciting. The reason for that, aside from the acknowledged master virtuosity of the entire orchestra, was Dr. Koussevitzky's own astonishing vitality, for he conducted the work with the energy and enthusiasm of a man half his years, pushing it along meantime with all his own stupendous musicianship.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on the 19th to perform an interesting program consisting of Haydn's C minor Symphony, Vladimir Dukelsky's G minor Violin Concerto (a first performance with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and the first part of Mahler's Third Symphony.

This Clipping From
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAR 9 1943

Free Concert For Servicemen

BOSTON, March 9 (U.P.)—Director Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston [illegible] Orchestra will give a free evening concert for men and women in the armed services here March 28, it was announced today. Tickets are obtainable through the Greater Boston soldiers and sailors committee of the USO.

[47]

This Clipping From
SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL
MAR 10 1943

RETAIN THEIR MUSIC SENSE

Army And Navy Allow Former Symphonic Players To Stage Concerts

BOSTON, March 10.—(INS)—"Symphonic jam sessions" for men and women of the armed forces will be held weekly starting Sunday under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, pops concert conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today.

"In New England army and navy camps and bases are many former symphonic and concert musicians of both sexes," a spokesman for the Symphony orchestra explained, "and this enterprise will enable them to get together and play symphonies for their own enjoyment.

Out of the movement may emerge a symphony orchestra, if it is found that the stay of a substantial number of the musicians "has some degree of permanence," he added.

The first session will be held at the Servicemen's Center, 26 Temple st., at 3 p. m.

A free symphony concert for men and women in uniform at Symphony Hall, March 28, was also announced. The full symphony orchestra will perform under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

Koussevitsky Program To Omit Martinu Work

Blackout Interrupted Symphony at Last Concert—More Familiar Selections to Be Played This Week

As noted in last week's column, the current season in this city is nearing its close. There remain only two more New Haven Symphony concerts in the Monday evening series besides the Young Peoples' concerts.

And this Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will formally close the Woolsey Hall Series. Comprised of 110 musicians, the orchestra will play an unusually interesting program arranged by their conductor Serge Koussevitzky. Opening the evening will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Opus 6, No. 10 in D minor, to be followed by the First Symphony of Robert Schumann, the "Spring" Symphony. The latter half of the program consists of two works by Debussy, the "Afternoon of a Faun" and "La Mer."

To many concert-goers here the omission of the Martinu Symphony which was to have been repeated this week will be a disappointment. Dr. Koussevitzky felt that the Martinu work is not compatible with the general unity of the program he has planned, for this Wednesday's concert, so has chosen to leave it out of the program.

Was Third Performance

Now that the concert halls here are duly prepared against blackouts, let it be hoped that no more deletions from programs be necessary. It was unfortunate that the lesson had to be learned at the third world performance of a contemporary work, but there is still hope of hearing the symphony here, it has been suggested.

Dr. Koussevitzky sanctions the work very highly, speaking particularly of the third movement, which we were not so fortunate to have heard. Perhaps another program by this orchestra may include the symphony when its spirit fits the particular selection made. It is more or less commonly said that endorsement of a work by this eminent conductor practically guarantees the fact that the work will be heard again.

For 16 years conductor of the Boston Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky, it may be said, requires either of two characteristics of an orchestral score. It must possess that intangible quality, beauty, or it must challenge interest.

Once convinced that the composition possesses one of these qualities, Koussevitzky fairly flames with enthusiasm for it. He works at rehearsal until he gets the orchestra at "white heat over it."

The intensity of a final rehearsal is recaptured by Koussevitzky in public performance to such a degree that the audience inevitably feels his interest enkindled.

Next Winter's Series

Contrary to usual procedure the announcement of the 1943-1944 Woolsey Hall Concert Series will probably not be made until early in the fall. It has been customary in the past few years to make the plans for the new season known at the last concert of the old. In instituting this plan for announcing the series in the fall, the management is reverting to former methods.

Among the reasons for this change are the many difficulties of transportation that have been in evidence particularly since the beginning of this year. The management of the series feels that a later announcement will be more feasible at this time.

An event of great interest to youngsters as well as to oldsters is to take place this Friday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House when the second Junior performance of the season is to be given. School children between the ages of 12 to 18 will form the audience of several thousand alert youngsters to journey from this state and from various points in New York to hear Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro."

Primed by their teachers in the glories of grand opera and in the music and libretto of the particular work to be heard, the children's audience is always among the most intelligent and appreciative of the Metropolitan Opera House audiences.

According to the Opera News, published by the Metropolitan Opera Guild each week during the opera season, and we quote with permission, 'ever since the experimental "Aida" in March, 1937, the Opera Guild has developed its program of Junior Performances, which have numbered 15 to date.' Since the time of the printing of this information, there has been another performance added to the list, since on January 29 Mozart's

Must Limit Sale

In the past two years, demand for seats for these Junior Performances has been so great that the Guild reports having to limit the sale to schools which have undertaken a Group Membership in the Opera Guild, "giving preference to communities where the Guild organization is most active."

Since the Foote School has a group membership with Mrs. Stella Nahum as music advisor and chaperon for the excursions to the metropolis, New Haven was represented at the performance of the Magic Flute in January.

Musically speaking, the Opera Guild's experiment several years ago is a great success. Avid listeners who have been schooled in the merits of opera and who know what to expect in the story take their opera with a cheer. At these performances they see on the stage embodiments of the spirit they have embibed through recordings, lectures and other school activities aimed at preparing them for the occasion.

Financially speaking, the Junior Performances operate through the Metropolitan Opera Guild which purchases the performance chosen by its educational advisory committee and which sells the seats at prices ranging from 35 cents to $2. The difference is made up through underwriting supplied by the sale of boxes, contributions and a certain percentage of membership dues.

HARRIS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE AT SMITH COLLEGE

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work First Heard Last Month—Fantasia, Scheherazade Also Heard

Northampton, March 9—The Smith college 1942-1943 concert series came to an impressive close at John M. Greene hall tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

It was not only the brilliance of the orchestra that made the final concert memorable but also the performance of the Roy Harris 5th Symphony which had its world premier in Symphony hall in Boston on February 27. Whether one found this work exciting or boring, it was at least refreshing to hear a work before musical pundits had catalogued it and tucked it safely away.

As in Boston, there must have been a sharp division on the merits of the work at John M. Greene tonight. For this reviewer, the work possessed power, originality and musical direction. If there were moments of doubt, they came in the second and third movements for the first-termed "Prelude" by the composer—carried a certain conviction and purposefulness that the other movements—Chorale and Dance Fugue—lacked. There was something excitingly elemental about the Prelude that contrasted sharply with the intellectualism of the Chorale and the formal preoccupation of the Dance Fugue.

The new Harris symphony, introduced by Dr Koussevitzky during the week that marked the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Russian red army, has been dedicated by the composer to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Tonight's program opened with a stunning performance of Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-string orchestra. If there were any anticipatory qualms about hearing two moderns on one program, they were dispelled by the melodic charm of this work as transmitted by the finest orchestral string section in the country. The final work was the Rimsky-Korsakov symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was impressive from the point of view of the virtuosity of the orchestra and the solo work of the concertmaster, Richard Burgin. From the musical point of view, however, it was like being on a merry-go-round with the brass ring coming up every five times around.

MILTON BERLINER.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
MAR 8 1943

OVERTONES

Berkshire Music Center To Suspend

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music center, announced Saturday that the board of directors of the Koussevitzky Music foundation had decided "reluctantly" to suspend the activities of the center due to the war.

In his announcement, the noted conductor said that "cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But, after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially of music."

Born at the brink of the war, the center managed to carry on for three years, although last year it was felt that opening of the center was inadvisable in view of the certain slackening of audiences for the festival period due to fuel rationing, and the number of young men in the armed services.

Dr. Koussevitzky, however, whose dream for years had been the establishment of such a cultural center in this country, was not to be deterred so easily. He formed the Koussevitzky Music foundation which financed and directed the center last year with sufficient funds to cover any deficits remaining at the end of the summer term. The Boston Symphony orchestra, which had directed the center during its first two seasons and was on hand for the festival programs, remained out of the picture, with the exception of certain leading musicians on the faculty last year.

Student Orchestra Proved Sensation

The student orchestra, comprised of highly trained and carefully selected instrumentalists from all over the country, proved one of the major musical sensations of 1942. Even the most wary person in the festival audience was frankly surprised at the talent, ability and professional calibre of the orchestra which performed for three week-ends difficult festival programs which varied little from the offerings of the veteran Boston orchestra.

People, already Berkshire-minded, attended the concerts in large numbers. if not in droves that had marked the two previous seasons. They arrived on bicycles and horseback, in passenger cars fileed to capacity with share-your-ride occupants. Buses transported additional hundreds from the nearby railroad station at Pittsfield.

That the move was taken this year, and the official declaration of its closing made by the conductor, is evidence that conditions could not be altered or confronted in any satisfactory way to merit the opening of the center.

That it will open again is an almost sure post-war possibility, Dr. Koussevitzky's great work, which made the center possible, has become an incentive to hundreds of center students already, students so imbued with the importance and value of the work accomplished there and the experience gained through close contact with leading authorities in every field of musical endeavour, that they will not see the center die. This is equally true of the men who have served on the faculty as well as the controlling boards of directors. It is also equally true of the thousands who have experienced the thrill of hearing great music presented by great musicians in a background of the great beauty of the Berkshire hills.

Center Has Exerted Wide Influence

Already, in its mere three years of existence, the center has exerted a wide influence in the musical life of America. One important step was the formation of the advanced student orchestra which led to the performing festival orchestra last year. Because of the excellence of the work, it was brought up this year that such a band, made up entirely of highly trained servicemen, might do for the Army camps what the show, "This Is the Army" did toward morale. Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times, highly endorsed such an organization in view of his knowledge of the success of the center orchestra. And he was not alone. Critics and musicians, servicemen and Army officers, endorsed the suggestion. Such an organization may yet come into being.

The effects of the center on many persons cannot be told as tangibly, but they are as real. Although the gates of the Tanglewood estate in Stockbridge are not open this summer, one center will still be alive, in the hearts and thoughts of all who have known its great and lasting gifts. It is the hope and faith of thousands that the gates will open soon again.

CELINE KOESTER.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussvitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6 No. 10
Beethoven..Symphony No. 4 in B flat Op. 60
Rimsky-Korsakov..''Scheherazade,'' Op, 35

Every once in a while a program comes along about which there is virtually nothing whatever to be said. Yesterday's was such a one. It was a good, conventional concert of old favorites and it was played with all the orchestra's well-known virtuosity of ensemble and beauty of tone.

The Handel gave the string section its opportunity to demonstrate its incredible achievements of sonority and unity. The Air seemed to have been taken too slowly throughout for its own good, and the accelerando in the final Allegro seemed to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's idea rather than Handel's, but it must be said it was a rather good one. At any rate, it supplied a fine, piquant effect, and Handel himself would have been delighted with it.

The Beethoven gave the conductor his opportunity to supply just the proper catalyst to bring this dreariest of all Beethoven Symphonies a semblance of interest. In no other of that composer's symphonies occur so many repetitious passages, so many stylistic frills and so many minor crises. It never quite fulfills the promise of its awesome opening adagio, and while the slow movement remains a song of the utmost nobility and serenity, everything else seems pretty quaint.

That this opinion is shared by practically no one else was obvious, for its performance brought a fine round of applause. And the opinion was shared least of all by the conductor, whose convictions were never more eloquently stated in terms of orchestral interpretation. He sought out every nuance and every subtlety of balance, yet never whipped up tempos or dynamic climaxes not in keeping with the character of the music. It was unquestionably a wholly authoritative performance to the last detail.

The Rimsky-Korsakov allowed both orchestra and conductor to remove the spigot, and the resulting cataract of sound was definitely something to hear. The performance abounded in elan throughout, which actually made this beguiling, over-familiar nonsense exciting. The reason for that, aside from the acknowledged master virtuosity of the entire orchestra, was Dr. Koussevitzky's own astonishing vitality, for he conducted the work with the energy and enthusiasm of a man half his years, pushing it along meantime with all his own stupendous musicianship.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on the 19th to perform an interesting program consisting of Haydn's C minor Symphony, Vladimir Dukelsky's G minor Violin Concerto (a first performance with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and the first part of Mahler's Third Symphony.

This Clipping From NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL
MAR 10 1943

IN THEIR C SENSE

nd Navy Allow Formymphonic Players To Stage Concerts

ON, March 10.—(INS)—honic jam sessions" for and women of the armed will be held weekly startunday under the direction rthur Fiedler, pops concert uctor, the Boston Symphony estra, announced today.

n New England army and camps and bases are many her symphonic and concert muans of both sexes," a spokesthe Symphony orchestra d, "and this enterprise able them to get together ay symphonies for their joyment.

of the movement may e a symphony orchestra, if ound that the stay of a substial number of the musicians some degree of permanence," dded.

he first session will be held at Servicemen's Center, 26 Temst., at 3 p. m.

A free symphony concert for n and women in uniform at mphony Hall, March 28, was lso announced. The full symhony orchestra will perform under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAR 9 1943

Free Concert For Servicemen

BOSTON, March 9 (U.P.)—Director Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a free evening concert for men and women in the armed services here March 28, it was announced today. Tickets are obtainable through the Greater Boston soldiers and sailors committee of the USO.

[47]

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 8 - 1943

MUSIC

Roy Harris, the Composer Born in a Log Cabin, Produces an American 'Fifth' Honoring Soviet

The name of a rangy, drawl-talking Southwesterner probably appears on more symphonic programs nowadays than that of any other American. That name is Roy Harris. It is on the score of his "American Overture—When Johnny Comes Marching Home" (1934)—which is constantly performed. His chamber music, maddeningly mathematical, is a favorite with the highest browed musicians, and the Piano Quintet (1937) is acknowledged a masterpiece. His Third Symphony (1939) and the Folk-Song Symphony (1940) stand high with critics and audiences alike.

Now the name Roy Harris is attached to a Fifth Symphony—the first really important American "Fifth." How it was finally finished is a story best told by Harris himself—just as he wrote it for NEWSWEEK from Cornell, where he is the university's Composer-in-Residence:

"If I had written all of the Fifth Symphony at the rate which the last page took, it would not be done until next June. The word got around the campus that 'it is done,' on the day before Christmas. Students of Johana's and mine started arriving to offer congratulations—to drink a toast and wish us a Merry Christmas—until I just gave it up and we had a wonderful time."

Between students, friends, and a "household which is elastic as German propaganda," it was quite a day. Harris was even beaten twice at chess. "But the symphony was finished," he concluded, "in the early Christmas morning after a cup of tea all alone with my charming wife, Johana—before breakfast festivities began again."

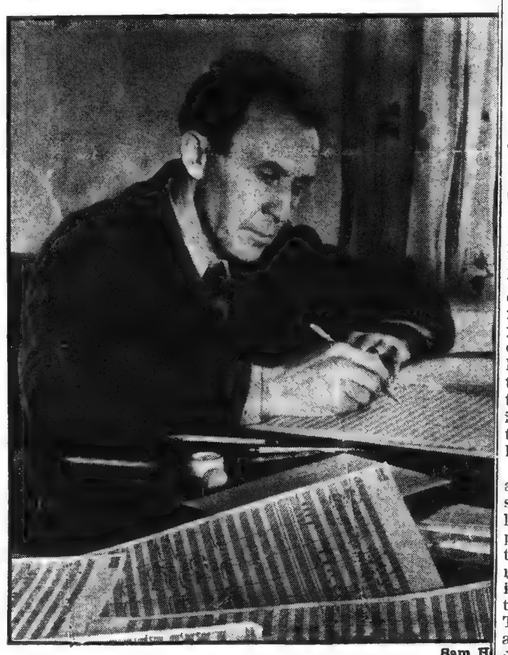
The work had been planned back in 1940, then promised to Serge Koussevitsky for the spring of 1941. "But after working on it during the month of September," wrote Harris, "I found I was not ready to write it. And so it was not until the summer of 1942 while I was in Colorado Springs at the great mountains nearby that I knew I could write the work. We came home to Cornell University and began the symphony in early October."

Virtually an unknown twelve years ago, today, at 45, Roy Harris is one of this country's most significant composers. It seems almost unbelievable that he was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Okla., on Lincoln's birthday, owned his own farm at 18, drove a truck while he went to the University of California, and did not even take composition seriously until he was 27. But it's all true and undoubtedly has given Harris's music the impact, strength, and individuality that is peculiarly his own.

A fairly prolific composer, Harris does not believe in the popular theory that great artists should starve. He almost never produces a work that is not commissioned.

Most helpful of the commissioners has been Koussevitsky. He and his Boston orchestra gave world premières to the first three Harris symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday nights it was again Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony who introduced the new Roy Harris Fifth. Dedicated to the Soviet Union and played in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Red Army, the symphony got a real world première on Saturday when it was broadcast in the United States by the Blue network, short-waved to all Latin America and beamed to England—whence it was relayed to Russia and North Africa.

Unconventionally constructed in three movements instead of the usual four, the symphony expresses what Harris feels is "the character of our times." The first movement—or Prelude—opens on a martial note of brass and percussion which drives forward with the rhythmic beat of men and machines. The second movement is like a singing chorale, with the strings carrying a mood of melodic tenderness. While the work as a whole seems to follow after the style of the now-famous Third, the last movement unhappily finds Harris playing musical chairs again with a fugue form that grows repetitious and confused.



Sam H

Harris finished his Fifth on Christmas

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND ADVOCATE
MAR 10 1943

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 10 1943

HARRIS' FIFTH SYMPHONY IS STIRRING OPUS

Featured by Boston Orchestra at Smith College Concert

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 9 — Preceded a few weeks ago, by a deal of publicity because the composer had dedicated it to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics," the Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris had its first hearing hereabouts tonight in John M. Greene Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual appearance on the Smith College Concert Course.

Stands on Own Merits

The symphony, however, stands on its own merits. Harris is quite the most significant symphonic composer in American music today. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has made known all his symphonies, giving to the First, Second and Third their first public performances.

While Shostakovitch, in his Seventh Symphony, portrayed the Russian people in their present life or death struggle, Harris has tried to express qualities in Americans which our popular dance music because of its very nature cannot reveal. It is his contention that "our people are more than pleasure-loving. We also have qualities of heroic strength, determination, will to struggle, faith in our destiny. We are possessed of a fierce driving power — optimistic, young, rough and ready — and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of the more tender moods. It is right that these gentler moods should live in us. Otherwise our strength and vitality might degenerate into a ruthless brutality."

To depict American life and spirit as he sees it, Harris has written his symphony in three movements, a prelude, chorale, and dance fugue. The prelude is a vigorous, hearty, blustering movement replete with dance rhythms, the chorale is dark-hued, introspective, in exact opposite to the extrovert nature of the prelude. The thematic material is quite lovely and there is a clever shifting of melodies between the winds, brasses and the strings. There is the slightest suggestion of Moussorgsky and "Boris" in the opening phrases of the chorale, even unto the sound of bells, but from then on, it is all Harris, inventive, skilful, and somberly heroic. The finale is given over to a triple fugue in three sections. The first and second sections are attenuated, not too interesting, but the final section, a double fugue, is magnificently orchestrated, culminating in a long drawn out, exciting climax. If ever there was mechanistic music, that was it.

Perfect Performance

This is the kind of music which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston players perform to perfection. Few conductors can build as impressive a climax as Koussevitzky and only an orchestra of virtuosi could play this music as it was played tonight. It left the listener exhausted but exalted.

The program opened with a definitive performance of Vaughan Williams' "Fantasie on a Theme" by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra." The performance was a model of exactitude and the Boston orchestra probably has the finest string section in the world. The solo quartet played with exquisite tone, the solo violin and viola were just right, and the varied fabric woven between the different groups had all the color of an ancient tapestry, colors undimmed by time.

The concert closed with a performance of Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," a performance as brittle and brilliant as we have ever heard. It seemed as though Dr. Koussevitzky was still under the spell of the Harris symphony. It was performance built upon heroic lines, a declamation of defiance, rather than an exotic tale after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." Even the Young Prince and the Young Princess were denied the right to romance. The seas were rough and Sinbad's ship was sorely tried. So were the ears.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 12 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Introduces Harris' Fifth Symphony in Carnegie Hall Concert

One fact stood out above all others regarding Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its first New York performance with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night: t was definitely American in character, in style and in expression. How representative the nusic is of America may be another matter.

There will be many to state their lislike of the symphony, and in nany ways they will be justified. But Mr. Harris himself admits that as the work unfolded, it seemed o assume the character of our imes. It became more martial, nore savage, more ominously rooding and intense" than he had irst imagined. Like many other reative writers, he has proved himelf a child of the times. We may ot like the times, but insofar as he music is a commentary on them t is successful.

This symphony is not restful, it s restless; it is not stable and ecure, it is full of a fierce driving power characteristically American. As Mr. Harris says of us, so his music declares that we are optimistic, young, rough and ready. His music is brash for the most part, a quality which leads him to use he brasses extensively. It has intensity and impact, heroic proclamation and excitement. We may not ike the sound of it or the way it s worked out, nevertheless it expresses something that appears to come out of the Middle West.

There are three movements: Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. The first opens with a flourish of horns heralding that heroism and love of freedom which is ours but also of the Russian people, according to Mr. Harris's dedication. What follows amounts to snatches of musical ideas, melodic fragments that sound as though they have close kinship with Western folklore. A rhythmic impulse takes hold and so churns them up that there is no melody in the accepted sense to be heard. As the work progresses this lack becomes a serious liability. Where there might have been some real melody in the Chorale, there is nothing to catch the fancy. The Fugue is an elaborate network of triple and double fugues theoretically good but on first hearing conducive chiefly to noise. The impression is one of great labor without accomplishing any well-defined end.

Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his customary attention of the work and the orchestra bravely responded. The applause was tentative at first, then became more consolidated when the composer came out to take his bow.

The concert opened with a harmless work: Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. In this the lush quality of the Boston strings acquired an organ quality of power and intensity. Incidentally, the work proclaimed composer accomplishment in craftsmanship. The concert ended with the Schumann First Symphony played with more of a heavy hand than might have been expected. It had been given here at the Academy of Music earlier in the week to better advantage both from the point of view of the interpretation and the playing.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 11 1943

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES BRILLIANT CONCERT PROGRAM

Inspirational magic was evoked by music last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a climactic close to the Woolsey Hall series. Catching the elusive qualities of each work on the beautifully balanced program, the Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky made music live. For no other description of the charm evinced would fully connote the sensations which imbued all those present.

As an ardent admirer of Handel, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D minor, opus 6, No. 10 by his composer to open the concert. The three movements, although copiously filled with tender soft sections which by many orchestras are played with saccharine romanticism, were restored in their original purity last night. Yet this clarity was not aloof but seemed to reach the homogeneous depths of each soul. It was the vitality, by turn robust, serene and piquant, which was constantly read into the score, that made the work seem ever new.

The last movement with its delicate dance figure was intriguing as its pattering became faster and faster though always remaining light in emotional demands.

Gem-Like Precision

It would be difficult to say that one work on the program assumed greater importance than any other since all were played with gem-like precision, but the appeal of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, Opus 38, seemed peculiarly strong. Coming at this time in the world's bouleversement, its verdure and zest for life were striking. Impeccable technical performance seemed only the base on which the orchestra built last night. The joie de vivre which Schumann expressed so frankly and yet so fancifully was exhilirating.

The Debussy works which completed the evening were subtle and full of fantasy thus rounding out the musical scope. The Prelude a L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" was played with such sensitivity that the audience needed time to arouse itself from its nostalgia, as did the faun himself in the poem, before the applause. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting of this work allowed smoothness and diffusion of that controlled vagueness so intrinsically Debussian.

More splashy in its technique, "La Mer" wriggled, squirmed and rollicked evincing reflections of both tangible and intangible bases. The chimerical qualities of both the real sea and the limpid sea of thoughts were suggested originally in the music and were touched upon with true genius last night.

In fact the whole evening was pleasureable for its flawless presentation and interpretation of familiar works. It brought our Woolsey season to a proud close.

By M. F.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 8 - 1943

MUSIC

Roy Harris, the Composer Born in a Log Cabin, Produces an American 'Fifth' Honoring Soviet

The name of a rangy, drawl-talking Southwesterner probably appears on more symphonic programs nowadays than that of any other American. That name is Roy Harris. It is on the score of his "American Overture—When Johnny Comes Marching Home" (1934)—which is constantly performed. His chamber music, maddeningly mathematical, is a favorite with the highest browed musicians, and the Piano Quintet (1937) is acknowledged a masterpiece. His Third Symphony (1939) and the Folk-Song Symphony (1940) stand high with critics and audiences alike.

Now the name Roy Harris is attached to a Fifth Symphony—the first really important American "Fifth." How it was finally finished is a story best told by Harris himself—just as he wrote it for NEWSWEEK from Cornell, where he is the university's Composer-in-Residence:

"If I had written all of the Fifth Symphony at the rate which the last page took, it would not be done until next June. The word got around the campus that 'it is done,' on the day before Christmas. Students of Johana's and mine started arriving to offer congratulations—to drink a toast and wish us a Merry Christmas—until I just gave it up and we had a wonderful time."

Between students, friends, and a "household which is elastic as German propaganda," it was quite a day. Harris was even beaten twice at chess. "But the symphony was finished," he concluded, "in the early Christmas morning after a cup of tea all alone with my charming wife, Johana—before breakfast festivities began again."

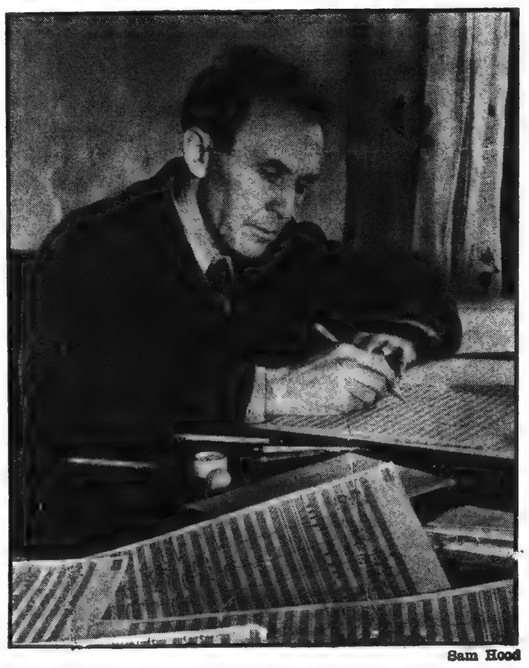
The work had been planned back in 1940, then promised to Serge Koussevitsky for the spring of 1941. "But after working on it during the month of September," wrote Harris, "I found I was not ready to write it. And so it was not until the summer of 1942 while I was in Colorado Springs at the great mountains nearby that I knew I could write the work. We came home to Cornell University and began the symphony in early October."

Virtually an unknown twelve years ago, today, at 45, Roy Harris is one of this country's most significant composers. It seems almost unbelievable that he was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Okla., on Lincoln's birthday, owned his own farm at 18, drove a truck while he went to the University of California, and did not even take composition seriously until he was 27. But it's all true and undoubtedly has given Harris's music the impact, strength, and individuality that is peculiarly his own.

A fairly prolific composer, Harris does not believe in the popular theory that great artists should starve. He almost never produces a work that is not commissioned.

Most helpful of the commissioners has been Koussevitsky. He and his Boston orchestra gave world premières to the first three Harris symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday nights it was again Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony who introduced the new Roy Harris Fifth. Dedicated to the Soviet Union and played in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Red Army, the symphony got a real world première on Saturday when it was broadcast in the United States by the Blue network, short-waved to all Latin America, and beamed to England—whence it was relayed to Russia and North Africa.

Unconventionally constructed in three movements instead of the usual four, the symphony expresses what Harris feels is "the character of our times." The first movement—or Prelude—opens on a martial note of brass and percussion which drives forward with the rhythmic beat of men and machines. The second movement is like a singing chorale, with the strings carrying a mood of melodic tenderness. While the work as a whole seems to follow after the style of the now-famous



Sam Hood

Harris finished his Fifth on Christmas

Third, the last movement unhappily finds Harris playing musical chairs again with a fugue form that grows repetitious and confused.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND ADVOCATE
MAR 10 1943

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 10

RIS' FI[lde]r
MPHO[N]
STIRRIN[G]

[ed] by Bosto[n]
at Smith C[ollege]
Concert

J. [By] Willard M. C[ole] AMPTON, March few weeks ago,
because the co[m] t to "the heroic people of our of Soviet Socialis
Fifth Symphon[y]
d its first hea[ring] night in John
the Boston Sym[phony]
ade its annual
Fifth College Conce[rt]
Com[m]ands on Own Mer[its] cid[ed] phony, however, the erits. Harris is De[c]ficant symphonic tion music today.
. S[t]y has made k[nown]
see[k] nies, giving to Third their fir[st]
cou[r]es.
prin[c]ipal
tion

[Sho]stakovitch, in hony, portrayed in their preser[ce] ggle, Harris has lities in America
r dance music b[ut]
ature cannot rev[eal]
tion that "our p[eople] pleasure-loving.
ies of heroic str[ength] will to struggle
We are posses[sed]
ng power — o[f]
gh and ready — a[n]
that our mechani[zed]
stroyed an apprec[iation]
tender moods. It gentler moods sho[uld]
rwise our strength
t degenerate into ty."
American life an[d] it, Harris has wri[tten]
n three movement[s]
le, and dance fug[ue]
a vigorous, heart
ement replete wit[h]
he chorale is dar[k]
e, in exact oppo[sition] rt nature of the ic material is quite s a clever shifting o[f] n the winds, brass
. There is the sl[ight]
of Moussorgsky and opening phrases n unto the sound o[f]
hen on, it is all skilful, and somber finale is given over e in three sections econd sections are o interesting, but t double fugue, is nestrated, culmina[ting] wn out, exciting
e was mechanistic

fect Performance
e kind of music w[ith] y and the Boston perfection. Few d as impressive tzky and only a[n]
osi could play th
played tonight.
exhausted but e m opened with ance of Vaugh[an] asie on a Th[omas]
Tallis for stra." The per[fect] of exactitude stra probably ection in the w[ind] solo quartet played with tone, the solo violin and vi just right, and the varie woven between the differe had all the color of an ancie try, colors undimmed by ti
The concert closed wit formance of Rimsky-K
"Scheherazade," a perfor
brittle and brilliant as we heard. It seemed as th Koussevitzky was still spell of the Harris sympho performance built upon h a declamation of defiance, an exotic tale after "The Nights and a Night." Even Prince and the Young Pri denied the right to romance were rough and Sinbad's sorely tried. So were the [48]

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 12 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Introduces Harris' Fifth Symphony in Carnegie Hall Concert

One fact stood out above all others regarding Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its first New York performance with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night: it was definitely American in character, in style and in expression. How representative the music is of America may be another matter.

There will be many to state their dislike of the symphony, and in many ways they will be justified. But Mr. Harris himself admits that "as the work unfolded, it seemed to assume the character of our times. It became more martial, more savage, more ominously brooding and intense" than he had first imagined. Like many other creative writers, he has proved himself a child of the times. We may not like the times, but insofar as the music is a commentary on them it is successful.

This symphony is not restful, it is restless; it is not stable and secure, it is full of a fierce driving power characteristically American. As Mr. Harris says of us, so his music declares that we are optimistic, young, rough and ready. His music is brash for the most part, a quality which leads him to use the brasses extensively. It has intensity and impact, heroic proclamation and excitement. We may not like the sound of it or the way it is worked out, nevertheless it expresses something that appears to come out of the Middle West.

There are three movements: Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. The first opens with a flourish of horns heralding that heroism and love of freedom which is ours but also of the Russian people, according to Mr. Harris's dedication. What follows amounts to snatches of musical ideas, melodic fragments that sound as though they have close kinship with Western folklore. A rhythmic impulse takes hold and so churns them up that there is no melody in the accepted sense to be heard. As the work progresses this lack becomes a serious liability. Where there might have been some real melody in the Chorale, there is nothing to catch the fancy. The Fugue is an elaborate network of triple and double fugues theoretically good but on first hearing conducive chiefly to noise. The impression is one of great labor without accomplishing any well-defined end.

Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his customary attention of the work and the orchestra bravely responded. The applause was tentative at first, then became more consolidated when the composer came out to take his bow.

The concert opened with a harmless work: Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. In this the lush quality of the Boston strings acquired an organ quality of power and intensity. Incidentally, the work proclaimed composer accomplishment in craftsmanship. The concert ended with the Schumann First Symphony played with more of a heavy hand than might have been expected. It had been given here at the Academy of Music earlier in the week to better advantage both from the point of view of the interpretation and the playing.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 11 1943

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES BRILLIANT CONCERT PROGRAM

Inspirational magic was evoked by music last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a climactic close to the Woolsey Hall Series. Catching the elusive qualities of each work on the beautifully balanced program, the Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky made music live. For no other description of the charm evinced would fully connote the sensations which imbued all those present.

As an ardent admirer of Handel, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D minor, opus 6, No. 10 by this composer to open the concert. The three movements, although copiously filled with tender soft sections which by many orchestras are played with saccharine romanticism, were restored in their original purity last night. Yet this clarity was not aloof but seemed to reach the homogeneous depths of each soul. It was the vitality, by turn robust, serene and piquant, which was constantly read into the score, that made the work seem ever new.

The last movement with its delicate dance figure was intriguing as its pattering became faster and faster though always remaining light in emotional demands.

Gem-Like Precision

It would be difficult to say that one work on the program assumed greater importance than any other since all were played with gem-like precision, but the appeal of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, Opus 38, seemed peculiarly strong. Coming at this time in the world's bouleversement, its verdure and zest for life were striking. Impeccable technical performance seemed only the base on which the orchestra built last night. The joie de vivre which Schumann expressed so frankly and yet so fancifully was exhilirating.

The Debussy works which completed the evening were subtle and full of fantasy thus rounding out the musical scope. The Prelude a "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" was played with such sensitivity that the audience needed time to arouse itself from its nostalgia, as did the faun himself in the poem, before the applause. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting of this work allowed smoothness and diffusion of that controlled vagueness so intrinsically Debussian.

More splashy in its technique, "La Mer" wriggled, squirmed and rollicked evincing reflections of both tangible and intangible bases. The chimerical qualities of both the real sea and the limpid sea of thoughts were suggested originally in the music and were touched upon with true genius last night.

In fact the whole evening was pleasureable for its flawless presentation and interpretation of familiar works. It brought our Woolsey season to a proud close.

By M. F.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

MAR 12 1943

Fifth Symphony By Harris Given

By Edward O'Gorman

The Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union, was given its first New York performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, sharing a program with the Tallis Fantasia of Vaughan Williams and the First Symphony of Schumann.

Between the rich string texture of the Tallis Fantasia and the fresh, spontaneous humor of the Schumann Symphony, both of which were played in a way that highlighted these qualities, the pitsy polyphonics of the Harris symphony probably seemed more humorless and forbidding than they really are.

It is difficult to grasp the melodic and formal gist of the symphony on a first hearing, and there is nothing suave or beguiling to capture interest once serious concentration has tired. This is severely unsmiling music, often clamorous with something puzzling to say; and the solid, square-toed character of the instrumentation gives it a curiously earth-bound sense. There is an unmistakable feeling of high artistic integrity behind it, however; and the struggle that one generally finds in music of this hard-working type is so faint as to be almost non-existent. Dr. Koussevitzky put a great deal of energy and passion into playing it, and it won a resounding ovation. Mr. Harris was on hand to receive it.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 10 1943

HARRIS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE AT SMITH COLLEGE

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work First Heard Last Month—Fantasia, Scheherazade Also Heard

Northampton, March 9—The Smith college 1942-1943 concert series came to an impressive close at John M. Greene hall tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

It was not only the brilliance of the orchestra that made the final concert memorable but also the performance of the Roy Harris 5th Symphony which had its world premier in Symphony hall in Boston on February 27. Whether one found this work exciting or boring, it was at least refreshing to hear a work before musical pundits had catalogued it and tucked it safely away.

As in Boston, there must have been a sharp division on the merits of the work at John M. Greene tonight. For this reviewer, the work possessed power, originality and musical direction. If there were moments of doubt, they came in the second and third movements for the first-termed "Prelude" by the composer—carried a certain conviction and purposefulness that the other movements—Chorale and Dance Fugue—lacked. There was something excitingly elemental about the Prelude that contrasted sharply with the intellectualism of the Chorale and the formal preoccupation of the Dance Fugue.

The new Harris symphony, introduced by Dr Koussevitzky during the week that marked the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Russian red army, has been dedicated by the composer to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Tonight's program opened with a stunning performance of Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-string orchestra. If there were any anticipatory qualms about hearing two moderns on one program, they were dispelled by the melodic charm of this work as transmitted by the finest orchestral string section in the country. The final work was the Rimsky-Korsakov symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was impressive from the point of view of the virtuosity of the orchestra and the solo work of the concertmaster, Richard Burgin. From the musical point of view, however, it was like being on a merry-go-round with the brass ring coming up every five times around.

MILTON BERLINER.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

MAR 2 1943

FIFTH SYMPHONY OF HARRIS PLAYED

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Less than a fortnight after its world premiere in Boston, Roy Harris's new Symphony No. 5 was accorded its first New York performance last night in Carnegie Hall at the hands of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Harris was present to ponder the fruits of his labors and to make his bows from the platform. So far as could be determined from the applause, the work was warmly received.

This is the 45-year-old American composer's weightiest and most ambitious composition. Because of its dedication it may gather unto itself some of the war connotations of the Shostakovitch Seventh, though there is no battle—no elegy—no triumphal rejoicing. It is "as an American citizen"—"convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods"—that the composer pays tribute "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally" (these are his words), "the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics." He does this because of "their strength in war, their stanch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

There are three movements, unusual in form and sequence. The first is a relatively short Prelude. The second is much longer and is called "Chorale." The third is styled "Dance Fugue." In this succession is relatively little that conforms recognizably to the principle of symphonic development. Indeed, Mr. Harris himself calls attention in the program notes to the circumstance that the first movement "moves always forward without development sections." He speaks of the second movement as "rhapsodic" and the third as a triple fugue in three sections.

Aside from its form, the symphony is unusual in its scoring, particularly in the body and emphasis of the brass. Tenor saxophone and two cornets are added to trumpets, horns (eight of them), trombones, and baritone as well as bass tuba. There are two English horns. The percussion is variously augmented, with marimba and vibraphone included.

The brass gives the work its most distinctive color, though there is a long (and for the reviewer, much too long) string climax in the movement called "Chorale." The block-like solidity of the brass sound in other parts of this movement seizes and holds the ear. This can be regarded as distinctive and individual instrumentation, whatever the doubts that may be held concerning the persuasiveness of the chorale theme. My own feeling is that the Prelude is decidedly more effective than either the chorale or the fugal finale. It is succinct. The other movements, at least on first hearing, are diffuse. The progress of the music is clear. Unquestionably it has feeling. Whether a sense of effort—no new consideration in dealing with the works of this composer—may be discounted with rehearings is at the moment conjecture.

The Bostonians played the novelty magnificently. The same must be said for their realization of the enchanting "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" that Vaughan Williams composed in 1910. The performance of the Schumann "Spring" Symphony, which concluded the evening, was a marvel of technical expertness, but more than a little brittle in sound. Everything was there but the "romantic" aura.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAR 12 1943

Maybe It Needs Self-Criticism

By HENRY SIMON

Maybe it was the reputation of the composer and the unusual ballyhoo; but whatever it was, Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, given its first New York performance Thursday night by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, made a disappointing impression.

If there hadn't been the high-pressure publicity of its radio premiere last month and a half-page ad running all week in the Carnegie Hall program that reproduced a high-flown dedication to Russia, a greeting from Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Gliere, Kabalevsky and half a dozen other Soviet composers, together with quotes like "tremendously exciting" and "Whitmanesque passion" from the Boston papers, we'd have expected less. And if the symphony had been played unheralded and anonymously, we'd have thought: "Now, here's a fine, vigorous talent and a strong young voice. If he'd take his symphony to a first-rate teacher (say, Roy Harris), it would be a good thing. Harris might make him be less relentless with of starting with them, make more of those the brasses, build up to his climaxes instead good tunes in the first and second movements, clear up the counterpoint in the third with better-spaced instrumentation, winnow out here and add there."

But, of course, Mr. Harris wrote the work himself, and he is a master, as he has shown clearly in his Third Symphony. In the Fifth he had, furthermore, a high purpose—to paint the American people seriously. There certainly is some fine material in it—the dramatic opening pages, the chant in the strings of the second movement, the syncopated tune in the third. Yet the total effect on a first hearing, is blustery, noisy, and overlong.

After the Harris symphony came a rarely beautiful performance of the Schumann First. With all its nineteenth century romanticism and modest orchestration, it had enormous vitality. No big bass drum, no chimes, no raucous brasses, and no patriotic message, but what life!

Those magnificent Boston strings opened the concert with Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The Fantasia is 33 years old and the theme 300, but the beauty of the score is timeless—or at least it seemed so in the performance given it by Dr. Koussevitzky.

ROY HARRIS, American composer, whose Fifth Symphony was given its first N. Y. concert performance last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall.
Photo by Geoffrey Landesman

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

Harris' 5th Played Here First Time

By GRENA BENNETT.

At last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall interest was centered in the first New York performance of the Fifth Symphony of the American composer Roy Harris.

The work was completed last Christmas and bears the following dedication:

"As an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my Fifth Symphony to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

In analyzing his work, the composer used such descriptive words as "savage" and "ominously brooding," which, in the opinion of this writer, comes very near to summing up a fair opinion.

It may have provided an interesting experiment for the performers, but there was an economy of enjoyment for the auditors. If the Harris work is music, then the heaven sent B flat Symphony by Schumann is something altogether out of order.

However, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra were sincere in their efforts, and for that are to be commended.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 12 1943

New Roy Harris Work Is Played By Bostonians

Fifth Symphony Is Given Under Dr. Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Concert

By Jerome D. Bohm

Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitszky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Williams
Symphony No. 5.....Harris
Symphony No. 1, B flat, Op. 48..Schumann

Being one of those musicians who listen to music for its intrinsic values, I have never paid much attention to programmatic descriptions of any kind; but when the composer himself tells us what his objectives have been in writing a work, as Mr. Harris has done with his Fifth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance on this occasion, it is impossible to disregard his comments.

Mr. Harris would have us believe that this symphony expresses the American people's "heroic strength—determination—will to struggle—faith in our destiny," as well as its "more tender moods." He tells us further that "as the work unfolded it seemed to assume the character of our times," becoming "more savage—more ominously brooding and intense" than he had intended it in the beginning.

This is a large order for any composer, even one as serious minded and sincere as Mr. Harris indubitably is. But noble as his intentions were in penning this symphony, it is extremely doubtful that he has succeeded in his aim in its three relatively short movements. If he had told us

[49]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

MAR 12 1943

Fifth Symphony By Harris Given

By Edward O'Gorman

The Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris, dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union, was given its first New York performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, sharing a program with the Tallis Fantasia of Vaughan Williams and the First Symphony of Schumann.

Between the rich string texture of the Tallis Fantasia and the fresh, spontaneous humor of the Schumann Symphony, both of which were played in a way that highlighted these qualities, the pitsy polyphonics of the Harris symphony probably seemed more humorless and forbidding than they really are.

It is difficult to grasp the melodic and formal gist of the symphony on a first hearing, and there is nothing suave or beguiling to capture interest once serious concentration has tired. This is severely unsmiling music, often clamorous with something puzzling to say; and the solid, square-toed character of the instrumentation gives it a curiously earth-bound sense. There is an unmistakable feeling of high artistic integrity behind it, however; and the struggle that one generally finds in music of this hard-working type is so faint as to be almost non-existent. Dr. Koussevitzky put a great deal of energy and passion into playing it, and it won a resounding ovation. Mr. Harris was on hand to receive it.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 10 1943

HARRIS SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURE AT SMITH COLLEGE

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work First Heard Last Month—Fantasia, Scheherazade Also Heard

Northampton, March 9—The Smith college 1942-1943 concert series came to an impressive close at John M. Greene hall tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

It was not only the brilliance of the orchestra that made the final concert memorable but also the performance of the Roy Harris 5th Symphony which had its world premier in Symphony hall in Boston on February 27. Whether one found this work exciting or boring, it was at least refreshing to hear a work before musical pundits had catalogued it and tucked it safely away.

As in Boston, there must have been a sharp division on the merits of the work at John M. Greene tonight. For this reviewer, the work possessed power, originality and musical direction. If there were moments of doubt, they came in the second and third movements for the first-termed "Prelude" by the composer—carried a certain conviction and purposefulness that the other movements—Chorale and Dance Fugue—lacked. There was something excitingly elemental about the Prelude that contrasted sharply with the intellectualism of the Chorale and the formal preoccupation of the Dance Fugue.

The new Harris symphony, introduced by Dr Koussevitzky during the week that marked the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Russian red army, has been dedicated by the composer to "the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Tonight's program opened with a stunning performance of Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-string orchestra. If there were any anticipatory qualms about hearing two moderns on one program, they were dispelled by the melodic charm of this work as transmitted by the finest orchestral string section in the country. The final work was the Rimsky-Korsakov symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which was impressive from the point of view of the virtuosity of the orchestra and the solo work of the concertmaster, Richard Burgin. From the musical point of view, however, it was like being on a merry-go-round with the brass ring coming up every five times around.

MILTON BERLINER.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

MAR 12 1943

FIFTH SYMPHONY OF HARRIS PLAYED

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Less than a fortnight after its world premiere in Boston, Roy Harris's new Symphony No. 5 was accorded its first New York performance last night in Carnegie Hall at the hands of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Harris was present to ponder the fruits of his labors and to make his bows from the platform. So far as could be determined from the applause, the work was warmly received.

This is the 45-year-old American composer's weightiest and most ambitious composition. Because of its dedication it may gather unto itself some of the war connotations of the Shostakovitch Seventh, though there is no battle—no elegy—no triumphal rejoicing. It is "as an American citizen"—"convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods"—that the composer pays tribute "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally" (these are his words), "the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics." He does this because of "their strength in war, their stanch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

There are three movements, unusual in form and sequence. The first is a relatively short Prelude. The second is much longer and is called "Chorale." The third is styled "Dance Fugue." In this succession is relatively little that conforms recognizably to the principle of symphonic development. Indeed, Mr. Harris himself calls attention in the program notes to the circumstance that the first movement "moves always forward without development sections." He speaks of the second movement as "rhapsodic" and the third as a triple fugue in three sections.

Aside from its form, the symphony is unusual in its scoring, particularly in the body and emphasis of the brass. Tenor saxophone and two cornets are added to trumpets, horns (eight of them), trombones, and baritone as well as bass tuba. There are two English horns. The percussion is variously augmented, with marimba and vibraphone included.

The brass gives the work its most distinctive color, though there is a long (and for the reviewer, much too long) string climax in the movement called "Chorale." The block-like solidity of the brass sound in other parts of this movement seizes and holds the ear. This can be regarded as distinctive and individual instrumentation, whatever the doubts that may be held concerning the persuasiveness of the chorale theme. My own feeling is that the Prelude is decidedly more effective than either the chorale or the fugal finale. It is succinct. The other movements, at least on first hearing, are diffuse. The progress of the music is clear. Unquestionably it has feeling. Whether a sense of effort—no new consideration in dealing with the works of this composer—may be discounted with rehearings is at the moment conjecture.

The Bostonians played the novelty magnificently. The same must be said for their realization of the enchanting "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" that Vaughan Williams composed in 1910. The performance of the Schumann "Spring" Symphony, which concluded the evening, was a marvel of technical expertness, but more than a little brittle in sound. Everything was there but the "romantic" aura.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAR 12 1943

Maybe It Needs Self-Criticism

By HENRY SIMON

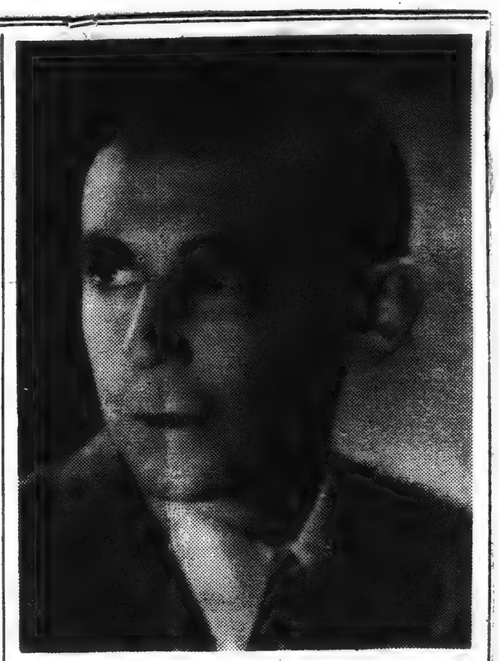
Maybe it was the reputation of the composer and the unusual ballyhoo; but whatever it was, Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, given its first New York performance Thursday night by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, made a disappointing impression.

If there hadn't been the high-pressure publicity of its radio premiere last month and a half-page ad running all week in the Carnegie Hall program that reproduced a high-flown dedication to Russia, a greeting from Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Gliere, Kabalevsky and half a dozen other Soviet composers, together with quotes like "tremendously exciting" and "Whitmanesque passion" from the Boston papers, we'd have expected less. And if the symphony had been played unheralded and anonymously, we'd have thought: "Now, here's a fine, vigorous talent and a strong young voice. If he'd take his symphony to a first-rate teacher (say, Roy Harris), it would be a good thing. Harris might make him be less relentless with of starting with them, make more of those the brasses, build up to his climaxes instead good tunes in the first and second movements, clear up the counterpoint in the third with better-spaced instrumentation, winnow out here and add there."

But, of course, Mr. Harris wrote the work himself, and he is a master, as he has shown clearly in his Third Symphony. In the Fifth he had, furthermore, a high purpose—to paint the American people seriously. There certainly is some fine material in it—the dramatic opening pages, the chant in the strings of the second movement, the syncopated tune in the third. Yet the total effect on a first hearing, is blustery, noisy, and overlong.

After the Harris symphony came a rarely beautiful performance of the Schumann First. With all its nineteenth century romanticism and modest orchestration, it had enormous vitality. No big bass drum, no chimes, no raucous brasses, and no patriotic message, but what life!

Those magnificent Boston strings opened the concert with Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. The Fantasia is 33 years old and the theme 300, but the beauty of the score is timeless—or at least it seemed so in the performance given it by Dr. Koussevitzky.



ROY HARRIS, American composer, whose Fifth Symphony was given its first N. Y. concert performance last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall.
Photo by Geoffrey Landesman

N. Y.
MERICAN

5th Played Here First Time

By GRENA BENNETT.

At last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall interest was centered in the first New York performance of the Fifth Symphony of the American composer Roy Harris.

The work was completed last Christmas and bears the following dedication:

"As an American citizen, I am proud to dedicate my Fifth Symphony to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their staunch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

In analyzing his work, the composer used such descriptive words as "savage" and "ominously brooding," which, in the opinion of this writer, comes very near to summing up a fair opinion.

It may have provided an interesting experiment for the performers, but there was an economy of enjoyment for the auditors. If the Harris work is music, then the heaven sent B flat Symphony by Schumann is something altogether out of order.

However, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra were sincere in their efforts, and for that are to be commended.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 12 1943

New Roy Harris Work Is Played By Bostonians

Fifth Symphony Is Given Under Dr. Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Concert

By Jerome D. Bohm

Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitszky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, ... Williams
Symphony No. 5 ..... Harris
Symphony No. 1, B flat, Op. 48 .. Schumann

Being one of those musicians who listen to music for its intrinsic values, I have never paid much attention to programmatic descriptions of any kind; but when the composer himself tells us what his objectives have been in writing a work, as Mr. Harris has done with his Fifth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance on this occasion, it is impossible to disregard his comments.

Mr. Harris would have us believe that this symphony expresses the American people's "heroic strength—determination—will to struggle—faith in our destiny," as well as its "more

Since Take-Off Jan. 18

TUCSON, Ariz., March 11 (AP).—A ground party reached today the wreckage of a wrecked B-24 Army bomber in the Galiuro Mountains and identified it as one that had been missing from Davis-Monthan

The Navy announced today thirty-five casualties in Navy forces, including two dead, three wounded and thirty missing.

This brings to 24,271 the total of Navy, Marine Corps and Coast

A wr bo ar bu

[47]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAR 12 1943

HARRIS SYMPHONY HAS PREMIERE HERE

Koussevitzky, With the Boston Orchestra, Presents Work at Carnegie Hall

A TRIBUTE TO RUSSIANS

Vaughan-Williams Fantasia for Strings and the Schumann Spring Symphony Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, held forth brilliantly last night in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was also marked by the first performance in this city of Roy Harris's Fifth symphony, given its première by the same organization in Boston last Feb. 26, in the week of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Russian Red Army, and dedicated by the composer "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their stanch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Mr. Harris says that he has hoped to express in this symphony "qualities of our people which our dance music, because of its very nature, cannot reveal—heroic strength, determination, the will to struggle and faith in our destiny—and I am convinced that our mechanical age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods." He goes on to say that as the symphony progressed under the weight of his inspiration it became "more martial, more savage, more ominously brooding and intense than I had imagined in the beginning. The symphony seemed to possess an independent life of its own which I had to accept and translate."

We applaud to the echo Mr. Harris's sentiments toward the Russian people. We do not question his sincerity and loftiness of purpose in the work heard last night. In some respects, as in the imposing sonorities and coloring of the middle movement, the symphony shows an advance in instrumentation, and in this movement in workmanship, treatment of form. For the rest, we find it a weak symphony, weak in invention, weak in statement and [illegible] first part is energetic on the surface, and it has the virtue of brevity, but is inferior to other symphonic music by Mr. Harris in essential value. Outside of this there is little sense of a real germination of ideas or completeness of thought. The triple fugue of the finale and the returns of thematic material from the first movement is technically more pretentious than its actual contents justify. The symphony, for this writer, is a labored piece of work and empty of important musical inspiration.

The other music of the evening was the Vaughan-Williams Fantasia for the double string orchestra on the theme of Thomas Tallis, and the Schumann "Spring" symphony. The strings of course sang the noble music of Vaughan-Williams with a sensitiveness and splendor of tone that became it marvelously well, and the composition itself is worth a journey, at least in its original form. For the present writer the version of last night sounded truncated and incomplete, shorn of some of its splendor.

The performance of Schumann's adorable symphony of the Spring was brilliant and glowing—if anything too brilliant, and with too little of simplicity and gemuethlichkeit. Some passages, as for example the second trio of the scherzo, were played faster than there was any need of doing. Schumann's orchestration, famous for certain ineptitudes, sounded brighter than it is. The listener had reason to say, "I never knew that scoring would sound so well." Yes, but there are intimacies in the music and certain color characteristics, unique with Schumann, which did not gain by this vivid interpretation.

The hall was packed for this concert, as now it invariably is when the Boston Symphony plays under its master's baton. There was long and cordial applause for Mr. Harris's symphony and he was twice led back to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky to acknowledge the manifestation.

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Blood Relation Eagle March 19 1943

Koussevitzky Introduces Harris' Fifth Symphony in Carnegie Hall Concert

One fact stood out above all others regarding Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its first New York performance with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night: it was definitely American in character, in style and in expression. How representative the music is of America may be another matter.

There will be many to state their dislike of the symphony, and in many ways they will be justified. But Mr. Harris himself admits that "as the work unfolded, it seemed to assume the character of our times. It became more martial, more savage, more ominously brooding and intense" than he had first imagined. Like many other creative writers, he has proved himself a child of the times. We may not like the times, but insofar as the music is a commentary on them it is successful.

This symphony is not restful, it is restless; it is not stable and secure, it is full of a fierce driving power characteristically American. As Mr. Harris says of us, so his music declares that we are optimistic, young, rough and ready. His music is brash for the most part, a quality which leads him to use the brasses extensively. It has intensity and impact, heroic proclamation and excitement. We may not like the sound of it or the way it is worked out, nevertheless it expresses something that appears to come out of the Middle West.

There are three movements: Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. The first opens with a flourish of horns heralding that heroism and love of freedom which is ours but also of the Russian people, according to Mr. Harris's dedication. What follows amounts to snatches of musical ideas, melodic fragments that sound as though they have close kinship with Western folklore. A rhythmic impulse takes hold and so churns them up that there is no melody in the accepted sense to be heard. As the work progresses this lack becomes a serious liability. Where there might have been some real melody in the Chorale, there is nothing to catch the fancy. The Fugue is an elaborate network of triple and double fugues theoretically good but on first hearing conducive chiefly to noise. The impression is one of great labor without accomplishing any well-defined end.

Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his customary attention of the work and the orchestra bravely responded. The applause was tentative at first, then became more consolidated when the composer came out to take his bow.

The concert opened with a harmless work: Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. In this the lush quality of the Boston strings acquired an organ quality of power and intensity. Incidentally, the work proclaimed composer accomplishment in craftsmanship. The concert ended with the Schumann First Symphony played with more of a heavy hand than might have been expected. It had been given here at the Academy of Music earlier in the week to better advantage both from the point of view of the interpretation and the playing.

This Clipping From BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

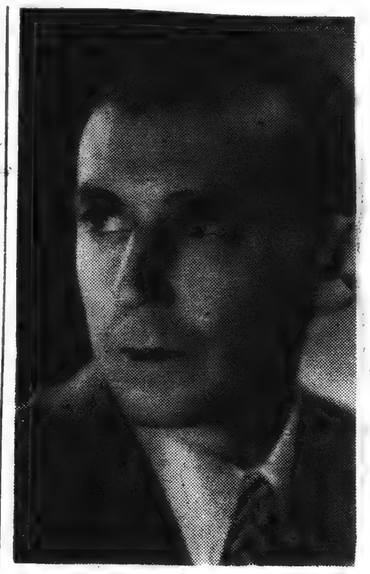
Maybe It Needs Self-Criticism

By HENRY SIMON

Maybe it was the reputation of the composer and the unusual ballyhoo; but whatever it was, Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, given its first New York performance Thursday night by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, made a disappointing impression.

If there hadn't been the high-pressure publicity of its radio premiere last month and a half-page ad running all week in the Carnegie Hall program that reproduced a high-flown dedication to Russia, a greeting from Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Gliere, Kabalevsky and half a dozen other Soviet composers, together with quotes like "tremendously exciting" and "Whitmanesque passion" from the Boston papers, we'd have expected less. And if the symphony had been played unheralded and anonymously, we'd have thought: "Now, here's a fine, vigorous talent and a strong young voice. If he'd take his symphony to a first-rate teacher (say, Roy Harris), it would be a good thing. Harris might make him be less relentless with of starting with them, make more of those the brasses, build up to his climaxes instead good tunes in the first and second movements, clear up the counterpoint in the third with better-spaced instrumentation, winnow out here and add there."

But, of course, Mr. Harris wrote the work himself, and he is a master, as he has shown clearly in his Third Symphony. In the Fifth he had, furthermore, a high purpose—to paint the American people seriously. There certainly is some fine material in it—the dramatic opening pages, the chant in the strings of the second movement, the syncoed tune in the third. Yet the total effect a first hearing, is blustery, noisy, and rlong.



ROY HARRIS, American com whose Fifth Symphony was gi first N. Y. concert performan night by Serge Koussevitzky a Boston Symphony in Carnegie Photo by Geoffrey Lanc

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

With the signing of a union contract the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to broadcast the first part of its Saturday night concert; and the fabulous beauty and refinement of sonority and execution survive the reduction of range caused by the telephone-wire transmission to points distant from Boston, and even the reduction in range in a small console radio (though they are heard with the interference that used to spoil Toscanini's Saturday night broadcasts). Not only, moreover, did the orchestra exhibit these qualities when Koussevitzky conducted it in his fabulous performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, but one could recognize it as the same orchestra when Szell conducted it in a good performance of Schubert's C major Symphony. That tells us something about Szell, but it also tells us something about the Boston Symphony—something in which this orchestra differs from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. At the time when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was conducted by Toscanini and was a great orchestra I don't think one would have been able to say one had recognized it as the same orchestra if Szell had conducted it. The difference would have had something to do with Szell, but a great deal to do with the attitude of the orchestra. That attitude is as important in the present New York Philharmonic-Symphony crisis as the mismanagement of the orchestra's affairs by the board of directors and the business manager; and I hope to say more about both next time.

B. H. HAGGIN

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Gives All-Russian Program With Borovsky as Soloist at the Academy

Koussevitzky was in a Russian mood when he selected his program for the fourth Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night. What he chose had its dash of the contemporary in the Miaskovsky Symphony No. 21 and the Prokofieff Third Concerto for Piano, but this apparently caused no distressing moments among the listeners. Most of them might have agreed that Miaskovsky appeared to write "in the tradition" in spite of the fact that this work had its first performance in November, 1940, and that after an interval of 20 years, whatever was "modern" about the Prokofieff Concerto had been properly tamed by the passage of time. Just to make everybody happy, however, Koussevitzky turned to an old war-horse like the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony to achieve artistic balance in his programmaking.

Miakovsky wrote persuasively in his 21st Symphony, and its lyric character has a winning way about it. The melodic lines of the single movement readily discernible, they are continuously expressive, they have the power of satisfying. It may be the lyricism more than anything else that holds the attention; its serenity and contentedness come as something of a surprise in a work so new. But contemporary harmonies are interwoven into this "traditional" fabric, imparting an appealing richness to the whole. The work was beautifully played.

Alexander Borovsky was the piano soloist in the Prokofieff. He tossed off the intricacies of the technically aspect of the work in brilliant fashion, not failing of the special effect gained in certain octave passages and in the glissandos of the final movement. The persistent staccato style of the music and the corresponding percussive treatment of the instrument gave him little opportunity to be poetic. But then, this was rhythm not poetic music; rather the opposite of the lyric content of the previous number. There was a sameness of color throughout the three movements that emphasized the composer's skilful and ingenious craftsmanship. There is no doubting that when Koussevitzky interprets Prokofieff the composer profits greatly.

Familiarity with the Tchaikowsky breeds only increasing admiration for the continuous appeal of his music. All its well-known, even threadbare effectiveness fell on the ear with remarkable freshness. The music never fails to quicken the spirit or spark the emotions when played as stirringly as it was last night. Parts of it were read with a broader tempo than is needed, but Koussevitzky achieved his purpose all the more thereby. How dramatic he makes this music, and how dramatically the musicians respond to his conception of it. The performance found them in one of their best moments.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

Future of Berkshire

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Announces Temporary Suspension But Heralds Inspiring Renewal

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of Art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the Arts and especially for Music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Thus Dr. Koussevitzky spoke as he announced that although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming Summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to suspend temporarily its activities.

Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the Center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment the Center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

[50]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 12 1943

HARRIS SYMPHONY HAS PREMIERE HERE

Koussevitzky, With the Boston Orchestra, Presents Work at Carnegie Hall

A TRIBUTE TO RUSSIANS

Vaughan-Williams Fantasia for Strings and the Schumann Spring Symphony Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, held forth brilliantly last night in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was also marked by the first performance in this city of Roy Harris's Fifth symphony, given its première by the same organization in Boston last Feb. 26, in the week of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Russian Red Army, and dedicated by the composer "to the heroic and freedom-loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a tribute to their strength in war, their stanch idealism for world peace, their ability to cope with stark materialistic problems of world order without losing a passionate belief in the fundamental importance of the arts."

Mr. Harris says that he has hoped to express in this symphony "qualities of our people which our dance music, because of its very nature, cannot reveal—heroic strength, determination, the will to struggle and faith in our destiny—and I am convinced that our mechanical age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods." He goes on to say that as the symphony progressed under the weight of his inspiration it became "more martial, more savage, more ominously brooding and intense than I had imagined in the beginning. The symphony seemed to possess an independent life of its own which I had to accept and translate."

We applaud to the echo Mr. Harris's sentiments toward the Russian people. We do not question his sincerity and loftiness of purpose in the work heard last night. In some respects, as in the imposing sonorities and coloring of the middle movement, the symphony shows an advance in instrumentation, and in this movement in workmanship, treatment of form. For the rest, we find it a weak symphony, weak in invention, weak in statement, undistinguished by original idea. The first part is energetic on the surface, and it has the virtue of brevity, but is inferior to other symphonic music by Mr. Harris in essential value. Outside of this there is little sense of a real germination of ideas or completeness of thought. The triple fugue of the finale and the returns of thematic material from the first movement is technically more pretentious than its actual contents justify. The symphony, for this writer, is a labored piece of work and empty of important musical inspiration.

The other music of the evening was the Vaughan-Williams Fantasia for the double string orchestra on the theme of Thomas Tallis, and the Schumann "Spring" symphony. The strings of course sang the noble music of Vaughan-Williams with a sensitiveness and splendor of tone that became it marvelously well, and the composition itself is worth a journey, at least in its original form. For the present writer the version of last night sounded truncated and incomplete, shorn of some of its splendor.

The performance of Schumann's adorable symphony of the Spring was brilliant and glowing—if anything too brilliant, and with too little of simplicity and gemuethlichkeit. Some passages, as for example the second trio of the scherzo, were played faster than there was any need of doing. Schumann's orchestration, famous for certain ineptitudes, sounded brighter than it is. The listener had reason to say, "I never knew that scoring would sound so well." Yes, but there are intimacies in the music and certain color characteristics, unique with Schumann, which did not gain by this vivid interpretation.

The hall was packed for this concert, as now it invariably is when the Boston Symphony plays under its master's baton. There was long and cordial applause for Mr. Harris's symphony and he was twice led back to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky to acknowledge the manifestation.

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

BROOKLYN Eagle
March 1943

Koussevitzky Introduces Harris' Fifth Symphony in Carnegie Hall Concert

One fact stood out above all others regarding Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, which had its first New York performance with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night: it was definitely American in character, in style and in expression. How representative the music is of America may be another matter.

There will be many to state their dislike of the symphony, and in many ways they will be justified. But Mr. Harris himself admits that "as the work unfolded, it seemed to assume the character of our times. It became more martial, more savage, more ominously brooding and intense" than he had first imagined. Like many other creative writers, he has proved himself a child of the times. We may not like the times, but insofar as the music is a commentary on them it is successful.

This symphony is not restful, it is restless; it is not stable and secure, it is full of a fierce driving power characteristically American. As Mr. Harris says of us, so his music declares that we are optimistic, young, rough and ready. His music is brash for the most part, a quality which leads him to use the brasses extensively. It has intensity and impact, heroic proclamation and excitement. We may not like the sound of it or the way it is worked out, nevertheless it expresses something that appears to come out of the Middle West.

There are three movements: Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. The first opens with a flourish of horns heralding that heroism and love of freedom which is ours but also of the Russian people, according to Mr. Harris's dedication. What follows amounts to snatches of musical ideas, melodic fragments that sound as though they have close kinship with Western folklore. A rhythmic impulse takes hold and so churns them up that there is no melody in the accepted sense to be heard. As the work progresses this lack becomes a serious liability. Where there might have been some real melody in the Chorale, there is nothing to catch the fancy. The Fugue is an elaborate network of triple and double fugues theoretically good but on first hearing conducive chiefly to noise. The impression is one of great labor without accomplishing any well-defined end.

Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his customary attention of the work and the orchestra bravely responded. The applause was tentative at first, then became more consolidated when the composer came out to take his bow.

The concert opened with a harmless work: Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. In this the lush quality of the Boston strings acquired an organ quality of power and intensity. Incidentally, the work proclaimed composer accomplishment in craftsmanship. The concert ended with the Schumann First Symphony played with more of a heavy hand than might have been expected. It had been given here at the Academy of Music earlier in the week to better advantage both from the point of view of the interpretation and the playing.

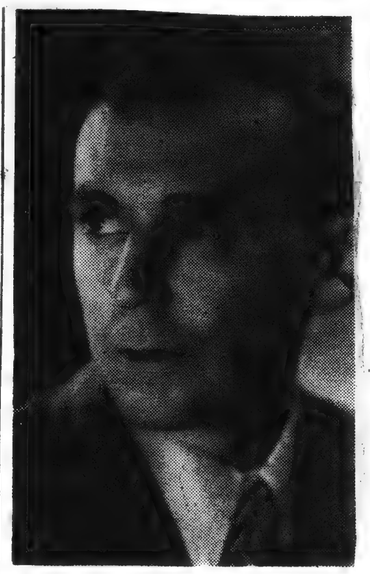
Maybe It Needs Self-Criticism

By HENRY SIMON

Maybe it was the reputation of the composer and the unusual ballyhoo; but whatever it was, Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony, given its first New York performance Thursday night by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, made a disappointing impression.

If there hadn't been the high-pressure publicity of its radio premiere last month and a half-page ad running all week in the Carnegie Hall program that reproduced a high-flown dedication to Russia, a greeting from Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Gliere, Kabalevsky and half a dozen other Soviet composers, together with quotes like "tremendously exciting" and "Whitmanesque passion" from the Boston papers, we'd have expected less. And if the symphony had been played unheralded and anonymously, we'd have thought: "Now, here's a fine, vigorous talent and a strong young voice. If he'd take his symphony to a first-rate teacher (say, Roy Harris), it would be a good thing. Harris might make him be less relentless with of starting with them, make more of those the brasses, build up to his climaxes instead good tunes in the first and second movements, clear up the counterpoint in the third with better-spaced instrumentation, winnow out here and add there."

But, of course, Mr. Harris wrote the work himself, and he is a master, as he has shown clearly in his Third Symphony. In the Fifth he had, furthermore, a high purpose—to paint the American people seriously. There certainly is some fine material in it—the dramatic opening pages, the chant in the strings of the second movement, the syncopated tune in the third. Yet the total effect a first hearing, is blustery, noisy, and erlong.



ROY HARRIS, American com whose Fifth Symphony was gi first N. Y. concert performan night by Serge Koussevitzky a Boston Symphony in Carnegi
Photo by Geoffrey Lanc

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

With the signing of a union contract the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to broadcast the first part of its Saturday night concert; and the fabulous beauty and refinement of sonority and execution survive the reduction of range caused by the telephone-wire transmission to points distant from Boston, and even the reduction in range in a small console radio (though they are heard with the interference that used to spoil Toscanini's Saturday night broadcasts). Not only, moreover, did the orchestra exhibit these qualities when Koussevitzky conducted it in his fabulous performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, but one could recognize it as the same orchestra when Szell conducted it in a good performance of Schubert's C major Symphony. That tells us something about Szell, but it also tells us something about the Boston Symphony—something in which this orchestra differs from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. At the time when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was conducted by Toscanini and was a great orchestra I don't think one would have been able to say one had recognized it as the same orchestra if Szell had conducted it. The difference would have had something to do with Szell, but a great deal to do with the attitude of the orchestra. That attitude is as important in the present New York Philharmonic-Symphony crisis as the mismanagement of the orchestra's affairs by the board of directors and the business manager; and I hope to say more about both next time.

B. H. HAGGIN

Future of Berks

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Announces Temporary Suspension But Heralds Inspiring Renewal

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of Art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the Arts and especially for Music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Thus Dr. Koussevitzky spoke as he announced that although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming Summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to suspend temporarily its activities.

Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the Center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support. At the earliest possible moment the Center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same high standards set in previous seasons. It will thus continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life.

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Gives All-Russian Program With Borovsky as Soloist at the Academy

Koussevitzky was in a Russian mood when he selected his program for the fourth Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night. What he chose had its dash of the contemporary in the Miaskovsky Symphony No. 21 and the Prokofieff Third Concerto for Piano, but this apparently caused no distressing moments among the listeners. Most of them might have agreed that Miaskovsky appeared to write "in the tradition" in spite of the fact that this work had its first performance in November, 1940, and that after an interval of 20 years, whatever was "modern" about the Prokofieff Concerto had been properly tamed by the passage of time. Just to make everybody happy, however, Koussevitzky turned to an old war-horse like the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony to achieve artistic balance in his program-making.

Miakovsky wrote persuasively in his 21st Symphony, and its lyric character has a winning way about it. The melodic lines of the single movement readily discernible, they are continuously expressive, they have the power of satisfying. It may be the lyricism more than anything else that holds the attention; its serenity and contentedness come as something of a surprise in a work so new. But contemporary harmonies are interwoven into this "traditional" fabric, imparting an appealing richness to the whole. The work was beautifully played.

Alexander Borovsky was the piano soloist in the Prokofieff. He tossed off the intricacies of the technically aspect of the work in brilliant fashion, not failing of the special effect gained in certain octave passages and in the glissandos of the final movement. The persistent staccato style of the music and the corresponding percussive treatment of the instrument gave him little opportunity to be poetic. But then, this was rhythm not poetic music; rather the opposite of the lyric content of the previous number. There was a sameness of color throughout the three movements that emphasized the composer's skilful and ingenious craftsmanship. There is no doubting that when Koussevitzky interprets Prokofieff the composer profits greatly.

Familiarity with the Tchaikowsky breeds only increasing admiration for the continuous appeal of his music. All its well-known, even threadbare effectiveness fell on the ear with remarkable freshness. The music never fails to quicken the spirit or spark the emotions when played as stirringly as it was last night. Parts of it were read with a broader tempo than is needed, but Koussevitzky achieved his purpose all the more thereby. How dramatic he makes this music, and how dramatically the musicians respond to his conception of it. The performance found them in one of their best moments.

[50]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 14 1943

Koussevitzky Gives Concerto By Prokofieff

Conducts Boston Orchestra in All-Russian Program; Borovsky Is Solo Artist

By Paul Bowles

Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, in the fourth matinee concert of the season, yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall; with Alexander Borovsky, pianist, as solo artist, in the following program:
Miaskovsky.....Symphony No. 21, Op. 51
Prokofieff..Third Concert for Pianoforte, Op. 26
Rimsky-Korsakov.....Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"

Dr. Koussevitzky presented his public with another all-Russian program yesterday afternoon. As usual the orchestra played beautifully and the public was grateful.

The high spot both of musical interest and of sound-making craftsmanship was Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, with Alexander Borovsky giving an impressively subtle version of the solo part. Instead of taking over the performance by insisting on the percussive and sonorously incisive possibilities of the part, he preferred always to blend the sound of his instrument completely with that of the orchestra. In order to accomplish this, he had to vary his tone quality sufficiently not only to echo the sound of a solo horn or several woodwinds, but to slip into and out of their passages without being detected. This was a less sensational way of playing the piece, but accoustically it was more pleasurable. Dr. Koussevitzky kept the music delicate, lucid and flashing, giving both ensemble and soloist every opportunity to recreate those icicles of sharp, high sounds that Prokofieff loves so much to make. Amazing though is may seem, the piano was quite out of tune, a fact which became painfully noticeable in the Andante meditativo of the second movement.

Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 21 is a stolid, sombre bit of twentieth-century writing in a nineteenth-century manner. Its intense lyricism is not unpleasing; in maestoso passages it sounds sometimes like Franck's Symphony. It might not have even this virtue, however, if played by an inferior orchestra. The playing of the final measures was a tour de force of hushed and hovering sounds. But the piece lacked definite personality; one's attention showed a dangerous tendency to stray.

Rimsky's "Scheherazade" is a rather ancient lady now. She has not aged very gracefully and one wonders why she still appears on programs. However, thanks to a perfect presentation by Dr. Koussevitzky, she was not too pitiful a spectacle yesterday. "The Festival at Baghdad" was actually exciting; it had the visceral impact that comes from the absolutely precise use of powerful sound.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

MAR 14 1943

It has been "reluctantly decided" to suspend the Berkshire Music Center this coming summer. Announcement to this effect was made last week by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky announced that previously members of the orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation had been formulating plans for the coming summer.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that "cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation, and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, and especially for music."

This Clipping From TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

MAR 14 1943

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GORDON E. YOUNG

WITH THE PASSING of another week, Tulsans have been privileged to hear two most enjoyable musical programs, one done by Marian Anderson, famed Negro contralto, and the other by Nelson Eddy, who seems to be a continual favorite among popular American baritones. Many are looking forward to the coming of Claudio Arrau, world-famed Chilean pianist who will play here April 7. Enthusiastic reviews have followed this brilliant South American artist wherever he has played and the announcement of his appearance here should be highly gratifying to those who have yet to hear him in person. His concert will be the last attraction offered this season on the Civic Music concert course.

On March 7, we spoke briefly in this column of the premiere given Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony February 27, in Boston by the Boston Symphony orchestra. We did not indulge in any speculation as to the worth or significance of this, his latest work. In the March 8 issue of Time magazine, however, we ran across some notes on the aforementioned premiere which we should like to present here and treat briefly. We quote in part: "Last week his Fifth Symphony (Harris') was premiered by Boston's Sergei Koussevitsky and broadcast the following night over the Blue network. Like most Harris symphonies, the Fifth was prefaced by an elaborate pronouncement by Harris explaining its deep relation to life, destiny and the United States soil. Few composers have so relied on words to plug their music. Short-waved by NBC to Russia and South America, the symphony was dedicated to the 'heroic people of the Soviet Union,' and played in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Red army. The new work was stormy and large in scale. It did not seem likely to disturb either of the two kinds of Harris listeners: 1) devotees who see in Harris' rugged themes a reflection of the energy and spaciousness of U. S. life; 2) skeptics like blind pianist Alex Templeton, who thought Harris' Third symphony sounded 'like a lot of people moving furniture around.'"

* * *

TO THIS MUCH of the article we do not object, but we do object to the fact that included with the above remarks was a picture of Harris at the piano which reminded us of a Boris Karloff impersonation and the comment under the picture ran thus: "Composer Harris . . . In Boston, they smelt something." These words referred to a criticism made by the Boston Herald's critic, Rudolph Elie, jr., and we quote: "It may even be that it (the Fifth Symphony) is the first truly indigenous composition of any lasting significance; there are those who smell . . . the more intimate details of American agriculture in its textures." All we have to say to this last is that evidently Mr. Harris' descriptive powers have not flagged since he wrote his Third symphony if he can depict, among other things, in this new work "the more intimate details of American agriculture" so realistically that Mr. Elie imagines he can smell them. And while Mr. Elie is smelling things, we would strongly recommend that he take a good sniff of some more of Shostakovich before he and his fellow critics again jump all over fellow-American Harris' work with hobnail boots.

Now to us, Harris' chief weakness in writing music seems to be that he becomes so interested in conveying the fine points of his story and the details of his picture that his pieces become incoherent and too literally imitative. In one of Harris' early works, "Cimarron," the composer has a shotgun fired as a literal imitation of one which was fired at the beginning of the historic Oklahoma land rush, which event the composer endeavors to describe in that work. If music is to survive it must possess at least a trace of musical form and balance and "must," to put it in the words of no less an authority than Deems Taylor, "paint its pictures in terms of music, and not in natural sounds."

* * *

WE RECENTLY found in a burlesque description of an imaginary symphony what we think is something rare regarding the overelaborate program note. It was written for a San Diego, Cal., newspaper more than 85 years ago by a writer named George Horatio Derby. We quote in part: "The symphony opens upon the wide and boundless plains, in longitude 115 west, latitude 35 21' 03" north, and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt river. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long note from an E-flat clarinet. The sandy nature of the soil, sparsely dotted with bunches of castus and artemisia, the extended view, flat and unbroken to the horizon, save by the rising smoke in the extreme verge, denoting the vicinity of a Pi Utah village, are represented by the bass drum. A few notes on the piccolo call attention to a solitary antelope, picking up mescal beans in the foreground."

Had we substituted the Arkansas river for the Pitt river in this rare bit, we might have had an approximation of the program of a Roy Harris symphony. It has been pointed out that Richard Strauss' Domestic Symphony is a fairly late example of the fatal results of being too programmatic. Commenting on this work, Deems Taylor remarks that, "heard without its program it sounds rather like a description of the home life of the dinosaurs."

* * *

IN OTHER WORDS, a wise composer accepts any program which he chooses for his music simply as a stimulus to his musical imagination and keeps the details to himself. For as his music grows older, people will tend to forget or ignore the program that the composer thought was so important and they will estimate the music at its own abstract value.

Quoting again from Mr. Taylor, we should like to leave with you these well chosen words, "The difference between the descriptive painter and the descriptive composer is that the former paints his program note, as well as his images. His story is painted on the canvas, and is an inseparable part of what you see. The descriptive composer, on the other hand, has his program only in the form of words printed on a slip of paper. All that he can hope to convey, in music, are the moods and sentiments that lie behind those words. If he wants his music to survive, therefore, he will do well to write something that conveys its own musical meaning to the listener who arrived late and didn't get his copy of the notes."

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
SUNDAY NEWS-AGE-HERAI

MAR 14 1943

BERKSHIRE CENTER SUSPENDED — Although a committee composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation have been formulating plans for continuing the Berkshire Music Center the coming Summer, it has been reluctantly decided, owing to war conditions, to temporarily suspend its activities, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces. "Plans, however, are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nationwide interest and support," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "At the earliest possible moment the center will resume its activities with its distinguished faculty and with the same standards set in previous seasons, and it will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had to lay aside their musical work to temporarily, and in restoring music to its rightful place in American life."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

10

MAR 14 1943

MIASCOVSKY WORK HEARD AT CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts His Twenty-first Symphony in Carnegie Hall Program

BOROVSKY PIANO SOLOIST

He Performs Prokofieff's Third Concerto—'Scheherazade' Suite Also Offered

By OLIN DOWNES

The twenty-first symphony of Nicolai Miascovsky, who is a man of many symphonies, opened the program of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This is an unconventional and appealing work; not unconventional in its harmonic fabric, or in any particular detail of instrumentation, nor yet in some novel manner of development of the ideas. It is unconventional in the flexibility, the unity and the logic of its form, the complete integration of this form with the musical idea that is the genesis of the work.

From this musical idea, which at first impresses one as being somewhat academically stated, the symphony burgeons. The musical thought, closely linked, begins to generate energy and strength in its growth. New ideas stem from the first one. The main contrast is furnished by a lyrical theme which appears, disappears, returns again and grows to a fine, curving climax, quite dramatic, and then subsides, when the whole symphony returns, with the effect of nostalgic reminiscence, to the source idea of its origin.

There is the emotion in all this of beauty and inevitability, of the sincere and admirable fulfillment of the poetical thought. And there's nothing "new," in the brash sense of novelty of idiom of device, in the whole thing. It's just a good, honest, fundamentally personal symphony.

The performance, so far as could be judged, of an unfamiliar score was not only technically of the finest, but also one of sympathy and imaginaton. The performance which followed, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist, was of Prokofieff's Third piano concerto. It was incontestably a brilliant and polished presentation, with a spectacular climax. Mr. Borovsky, with Dr. Koussevitzky, was repeatedly recalled. For all that, this performance, in its careful proportion and precision of detail, was far from the savage satire and the cyclonic energy and insolence which are in the music.

The final interpretation of a very well-known masterpiece capped the afternoon: the "Schéhérazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, received with tumultuous applause.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAR 14 1943

SCHUMAN PREMIERE

William Schuman's "A Free Song" (Secular Cantata, No. 2) for chorus and orchestra, with text adapted from poems by Walt Whitman, will receive its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, under Serge Koussevitzky, March 26 and 27, in Boston.

[51]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Bill

Miaskovsky Music Featured; Town Hall Hears Boy Pianist

By GRENA BENNETT.

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussitvitsky, was devoted to music by Russian composers.

First was Symphony No. 21 by Miaskovsky, who is credited with 23 works of similar calibre. Two years ago it was awarded the Stalin prize of 100,000 rubles.

Alexander Borovsky was the solo pianist in Prokofieff's Third Concerto.

Borovsky offered a satisfying and convincing exhibition of his poetic insight and technical skill.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar "Scherherazade" Suite, inspired by a chapter from "The Thousand and One Nights," was the final number.

* * *

Town Hall had a children's matinee yesterday with Richard Korbel, eight-year-old pianist, host and entertainer to hundreds of little girls and boys.

Young Korbel gave a remarkable performance in scores by Bach, Scarlatti, Schumann and Debussy. His reading of Bach's C minor Organ Prelude and Fugue was clean-cut and capable.

* * *

"Trovatore" again proved its popularity at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon. The singers were Stella Roman as Leonora; Kerstin Thorborg, Azucena; Maxine Stellman, Inez; Arthur Carron, Manrico; Francesco Valentino, De Luna; Nicola Moscona, Ferrando; Lodovico Olivero, Ruiz; and Walter Cassell, the Gypsy. Cesare Sodero conducted.

Symphonic Jam

From three to six yesterday afternoon at St. Paul's service center on Temple place you couldn't have heard a cymbal drop. For a couple of dozen service men and a girl were having a symphonic "jam session," and it was every man for himself and heaven help the trombone player.

It was the first of Arthur Fiedler's new series of musical reading sessions for officers and men of the armed forces, and was sponsored by Mr. Fiedler and a committee from the Boston Symphony orchestra headed by Rosario Mazzeo in association with St. Paul's service center. Simple enough, the idea is designed to permit musicians in the ranks, men and women with musical backgrounds, to get together and play masterworks from the symphonic literature rather than just listen to them.

Until the appointed hour yesterday, Mr. Fiedler, who thought up the idea and who contributes his time and talents to the job of conducting the orchestra, had no idea what to expect. Here's what he got: 16 soldiers, including a second lieutenant, eight sailors, including seaman Don McCormick who only had room on his service badge for four of his nine "seen action" stars, and a girl, who played the cello while her soldier husband held down the first oboist's desk.

There were 11 string players, a dozen or so woodwinds and brasses, and a couple of percussion players. While the B. S. O. supplied some of the instruments (and Roger Voisin to help out in the trumpet section), all the stands and music, it didn't have quite enough instruments to go around this time, so Carmen Ficocelli, conductor of the Youngstown Symphony, had to sit out, but next time there'll be plenty of spare fiddles.

The orchestra promptly lit into Haydn's B flat major Symphony and whizzed through it like a veteran ensemble. Then came the dances from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which went even better. The session ended with a reading of Saint Saens' "Youth of Hercules," and coffee and sandwiches were served all around. The next "jam session" takes place on Sunday at three, and men and women in the service who want to sit in but haven't their instruments will be supplied if they'll drop a postal card to Mr. Mazzeo at Symphony Hall.

HITTING HAYDN ON HIGH at the Symphonic Jam Session Yesterday—At right is Warrant Officer William Tesson, Fort Devens bandleader, who doubled in brass after playing first bassoon, and left, Corp. William Martin, also of Fort Devens, with the bull fiddle.

Fiedler Leads 'Jam' Session

Continued from the First Page

Actually, there were several present yesterday who were professionals in civilian life. One, Seaman 2d class Louis Zide, was for eight years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1935. He is stationed at South Weymouth.

Now a regular symphony orchestra has a definite proportion of instruments in the different sections. It would be pretty much of a miracle to assemble a full symphonic orchestra of service people on leave. Here is how it turned out yesterday at the start of the session: Three first violins, two second violins, one viola, two cellos, one flute, three clarinets, two horns, two trumpets, one double-bass (or bull fiddle), and a set of tympani.

There was doubling in brass, or rather for brass. Warrant Officer William Tesson, bandleader, of Fort Devens, took over a first bassoon part, and the second bassoon part was played by an alto clarinet. For the minuet of the Haydn Symphony, the three clarinets moved over into the second-fiddle section.

There was one commissioned officer, 2d Lieut. Morton Dworshak, violin. One civilian could be seen, the former Olivia Silberberg, cellist, now married to private first class Raymond Toubman of Fort Devens. Private Toubman was playing oboe a few seats away.

One Negro, a sailor, a bass drummer and a veteran of World War I, encountered the difficulty met by several potential players: a lack of specific instruments. Some of the men did not have their own instruments. Mr. Fiedler found more fiddlers on hand than there were fiddles to play. At the next session, presumably, there will be more fiddles and a bass drum.

Rosario Mazzeo, bass-clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is business manager and "general coordinator" of the "Symphonic Jam Sessions," and the USO-Greater Boston Soldiers and Sailors Committee is assisting in operating them. From time to time various members of the Boston Symphony will be invited to give technical assistance, and to play when another instrument is needed. Yesterday, trumpeter Roger Voisin was there.

C. W. D.

Symphonic Jam Session

Service Men, Fiedler Whoop It Up for Haydn

Some of the boys from Army, Navy and Coast Guard got together with Arthur Fiedler at the Temple Place Center yesterday afternoon, for the first of a series of "Symphonic Jam Sessions."

There were 24, all told, 16 from the Army, eight from the Navy and Coast Guard. Up to the spacious room on the fifth floor of the center they went, tuned up their instruments and dove into Haydn's B-flat Symphony, No. 98.

As this chronicler left, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra, all perspiring by then, with contentment on most of their faces, were whooping it up with three dances from Smetana's opera "The Bartered Bride."

All In Service Welcome

These "Symphonic Jam Sessions" are something new hereabouts, and they are just what their name implies: opportunity for men and women in the military services to play symphonic music just for the fun of playing. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and Esplanade concerts, is giving his services as leader. Any man or woman in the services who can play an orchestral instrument is welcome to attend. Whether they are of professional or amateur standing doesn't matter.

Fiedler Leads

Continued on Page 14

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 17 1943

New Roy Harris Work Is Played By Bostonians

Fifth Symphony Is Given Under Dr. Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Concert

By Jerome D. Bohm

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday night. The program:
Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Williams
Symphony No. 5.....Harris
Symphony No. 1, B flat, Op. 38..Schumann

Being one of those musicians who listen to music for its intrinsic values, I have never paid much attention to programmatic descriptions of any kind; but when the composer himself tells us what his objectives have been in writing a work, as Mr. Harris has done with his Fifth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance on this occasion, it is impossible to disregard his comments.

Mr. Harris would have us believe that this symphony expresses the American people's "heroic strength—determination—will to struggle—faith in our destiny," as well as its "more tender moods." He tells us further that "as the work unfolded it seemed to assume the character of our times," becoming "more savage—more ominously brooding and intense" than he had intended it in the beginning.

This is a large order for any composer, even one as serious-minded and sincere as Mr. Harris indubitably is. But noble as his intentions were in penning this symphony, it is extremely doubtful that he has succeeded in his aim in its three relatively short movements. If he had told us that he had taken a small slice of American life as experienced perhaps in his native Lincoln County, Okla., and sought to depict its essence in his music, one would

Pictures Music as a Force Against Evil, Destruction

Boston Symphony Leader Says Art Is Medium For Healing

Picturing music as a powerful force against evil and destruction, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urges that art be used as medium for healing, comforting and inspiring a war-torn world.

Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his famous musical organization here on Sunday afternoon, April 4, as a presentation of Rutgers University's Music Department, in the Rutgers Gymnasium. It will be one of his few appearances in this vicinity outside of New York and a featured part of the regular college itinerary.

"Of all the arts, music is the most powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has power to heal, comfort and inspire. In these perilous days, it is the mission of art to protect the fundamental values for which our armies are fighting; to shelter the enobling, everlasting treasures of art, to maintain the high standard of morale, of culture and thought."

The famous conductor warns that our duty must be to transport inspiration through music to the battle-front. "Music is a living and active force which is essential for preserving the burning spirit and the lasting aspirations and ideals," he says.

Must Carry Inspiration

"We have to fulfill the great and pressing task of carrying the torch of art and inspiration to the battlefront. Millions of men at arms need our music. We cannot afford to waste time. The war goes on at a terrifying pace. Not for a day, nor for an hour does bloodshed stop."

Dr. Koussevitzky believes music is a dominant factor in preserving our national morale. "Hordes of unholy forces have attacked, invaded and imperilled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressors and their devastating demoralizing forces. As we know, this is a war of the people as much as of the soldier. Every atom of artistic effort must be mobilized and thrown into action."

He cites Russia as a vivid example where art is used as a weapon of war. "Artists go to the front in the heat of battle where they witness true heroism, and learn to know what is life and death, love and hatred." Thus by experiencing the depth of human emotion the artist is able to give an illuminating account of it, Dr. Koussevitzky asserts.

A program of wide appeal, including selections by Mozart, Beethoven, Debussy and Ravel, has been arranged for the concert.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAR 19 1943

The Boston Symphony broadcast of Saturday, February 27 presented the first performance of the Third Symphony of Roy Harris. Recently Mr. Harris received a letter forwarded to him from the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It contained a request for his photograph and for some notes on his own compositions. It was written by Professor Igor Boelza, who is writing a book on American music for Russian readers. The Russian musicologist wrote that he had lectured extensively on American music and American composers and that Mr. Harris's first piano sonata had been performed in an all-American program under the auspices of the Union of Soviet Composers. He concluded his letter as follows: "On behalf of Soviet composers I salute you in these hard days of Second World War. We hope that our great peoples will stand to the utmost limit of our combined resources to make the world for all time a safe place for democracy and free art."

* * *

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 14 1943

Boston Symphony Plays Russian Bill

Miaskovsky Music Featured; Town Hall Hears Boy Pianist

By GRENA BENNETT.

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussitvitsky, was devoted to music by Russian composers.

First was Symphony No. 21 by Miaskovsky, who is credited with 23 works of similar calibre. Two years ago it was awarded the Stalin prize of 100,000 rubles.

Alexander Borovsky was the solo pianist in Prokofieff's Third Concerto.

Borovsky offered a satisfying and convincing exhibition of his poetic insight and technical skill.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar "Scherherazade" Suite, inspired by a chapter from "The Thousand and One Nights," was the final number.

* * *

Town Hall had a children's matinee yesterday with Richard Korbel, eight-year-old pianist, host and entertainer to hundreds of little girls and boys.

Young Korbel gave a remarkable performance in scores by Bach, Scarlatti, Schumann and Debussy. His reading of Bach's C minor Organ Prelude and Fugue was clean-cut and capable.

* * *

"Trovatore" again proved its popularity at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon. The singers were Stella Roman as Leonora; Kerstin Thorborg, Azucena; Maxine Stellman, Inez; Arthur Carron, Manrico; Francesco Valentino, De Luna; Nicola Moscona, Ferrando; Lodovico Oliviero, Ruiz; and Walter Gassell, the Gypsy. Cesare Sodero conducted.

Symphonic Jam

From three to six yesterday afternoon at St. Paul's service center on Temple place you couldn't have heard a cymbal drop. For a couple of dozen service men and a girl were having a symphonic "jam session," and it was every man for himself and heaven help the trombone player.

It was the first of Arthur Fiedler's new series of musical reading sessions for officers and men of the armed forces, and was sponsored by Mr. Fiedler and a committee from the Boston Symphony orchestra headed by Rosario Mazzeo in association with St. Paul's service center. Simple enough, the idea is designed to permit musicians in the ranks, men and women with musical backgrounds, to get together and play masterworks from the symphonic literature rather than just listen to them.

Until the appointed hour yesterday, Mr. Fiedler, who thought up the idea and who contributes his time and talents to the job of conducting the orchestra, had no idea what to expect. Here's what he got: 16 soldiers, including a second lieutenant, eight sailors, including seaman Don McCormick who only had room on his service badge for four of his nine "seen action" stars, and a girl, who played the cello while her soldier husband held down the first oboist's desk.

There were 11 string players, a dozen or so woodwinds and brasses, and a couple of percussion players. While the B. S. O. supplied some of the instruments (and Roger Voisin to help out in the trumpet section), all the stands and music, it didn't have quite enough instruments to go around this time, so Carmen Ficocelli, conductor of the Youngstown Symphony, had to sit out, but next time there'll be plenty of spare fiddles.

The orchestra promptly lit into Haydn's B flat major Symphony and whizzed through it like a veteran ensemble. Then came the dances from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which went even better. The session ended with a reading of Saint Saens' "Youth of Hercules," and coffee and sandwiches were served all around. The next "jam session" takes place on Sunday at three, and men and women in the service who want to sit in but haven't their instruments will be supplied if they'll drop a postal card to Mr. Mazzeo at Symphony Hall.

HITTING HAYDN ON HIGH at the Symphonic Jam Session Yesterday—At right is Warrant Officer William Tesson, Fort Devens bandleader, who doubled in brass after playing first bassoon, and left, Corp. William Martin, also of Fort Devens, with the bull fiddle.

Fiedler Leads 'Jam' Session

Continued from the First Page

Actually, there were several present yesterday who were professionals in civilian life. One, Seaman 2d class Louis Zide, was for eight years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra until 1935. He is stationed at South Weymouth.

Now a regular symphony orchestra has a definite proportion of instruments in the different sections. It would be pretty much of a miracle to assemble a full symphonic orchestra of service people on leave. Here is how it turned out yesterday at the start of the session: Three first violins, two second violins, one viola, two cellos, one flute, three clarinets, two horns, two trumpets, one double-bass (or bull fiddle), and a set of tympani.

There was doubling in brass, or rather for brass. Warrant Officer William Tesson, bandleader, of Fort Devens, took over a first bassoon part, and the second bassoon part was played by an alto clarinet. For the minuet of the Haydn Symphony, the three clarinets moved over into the second-fiddle section.

There was one commissioned officer, 2d Lieut. Morton Dworshak, violin. One civilian could be seen, the former Olivia Silberberg, cellist, now married to private first class Raymond Toubman of Fort Devens. Private Toubman was playing oboe a few seats away.

One Negro, a sailor, a bass drummer and a veteran of World War I, encountered the difficulty met by several potential players: a lack of specific instruments. Some of the men did not have their own instruments. Mr. Fiedler found more fiddlers on hand than there were fiddles to play. At the next session, presumably, there will be more fiddles and a bass drum.

Rosario Mazzeo, bass-clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is business manager and "general coordinator" of the "Symphonic Jam Sessions," and the USO-Greater Boston Soldiers and Sailors Committee is assisting in operating them. From time to time various members of the Boston Symphony will be invited to give technical assistance, and to play when another instrument is needed. Yesterday, trumpeter Roger Voisin was there.

C. W. D.

Symphonic Jam Session

Service Men, Fiedler Whoop It Up for Haydn

Some of the boys from Army, Navy and Coast Guard got together with Arthur Fiedler at the Temple Place Center yesterday afternoon, for the first of a series of "Symphonic Jam Sessions."

There were 24, all told, 16 from the Army, eight from the Navy and Coast Guard. Up to the spacious room on the fifth floor of the center they went, tuned up their instruments and dove into Haydn's B-flat Symphony, No. 98.

As this chronicler left, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra, all perspiring by then, with contentment on most of their faces, were whooping it up with three dances from Smetana's opera "The Bartered Bride."

All In Service Welcome

These "Symphonic Jam Sessions" are something new hereabouts, and they are just what their name implies: opportunity for men and women in the military services to play symphonic music just for the fun of playing. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and Esplanade concerts, is giving his services as leader. Any man or woman in the services who can play an orchestral instrument is welcome to attend. Whether they are of professional or amateur standing doesn't matter.

Fiedler Leads
Continued on Page 14

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 17 1943

New Roy Harris Work Is Played By Bostonians

Fifth Symphony Is Given Under Dr. Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Concert

By Jerome D. Bohm

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday night. The program:
Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, ... Williams
Symphony No. 5 ..... Harris
Symphony No. 1, B flat, Op. 38 ..... Schumann

Being one of those musicians who listen to music for its intrinsic values, I have never paid much attention to programmatic descriptions of any kind; but when the composer himself tells us what his objectives have been in writing a work, as Mr. Harris has done with his Fifth Symphony, which was given its first New York performance on this occasion, it is impossible to disregard his comments.

Mr. Harris would have us believe that this symphony expresses the American people's "heroic strength—determination—will to struggle—faith in our destiny," as well as its "more tender moods." He tells us further that "as the work unfolded it seemed to assume the character of our times," becoming "more savage—more ominously brooding and intense" than he had intended it in the beginning.

This is a large order for any composer, even one as serious-minded and sincere as Mr. Harris indubitably is. But noble as his intentions were in penning this symphony, it is extremely doubtful that he has succeeded in his aim in its three relatively short movements. If he had told us that he had taken a small slice of American life as experienced perhaps in his native Lincoln County, Okla., and sought to depict its essence in his music, one would

Pictures Music as a Force Against Evil, Destruction

Boston Symphony Leader Says Art Is Medium For Healing

Picturing music as a powerful force against evil and destruction, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urges that art be used as medium for healing, comforting and inspiring a war-torn world.

Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his famous musical organization here on Sunday afternoon, April 4, as a presentation of Rutgers University's Music Department, in the Rutgers Gymnasium. It will be one of his few appearances in this vicinity outside of New York and a featured part of the regular college itinerary.

"Of all the arts, music is the most powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has power to heal, comfort and inspire. In these perilous days, it is the mission of art to protect the fundamental values for which our armies are fighting; to shelter the enobling, everlasting treasures of art, to maintain the high standard of morale, of culture and thought."

The famous conductor warns that our duty must be to transport inspiration through music to the battle-front. "Music is a living and active force which is essential for preserving the burning spirit and the lasting aspirations and ideals," he says.

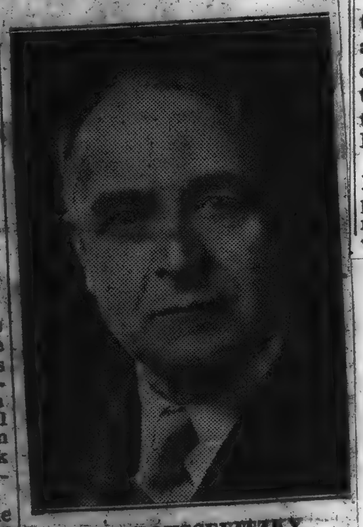
Must Carry Inspiration

"We have to fulfill the great and pressing task of carrying the torch of art and inspiration to the battlefront. Millions of men at arms need our music. We cannot afford to waste time. The war goes on at a terrifying pace. Not for a day, nor for an hour does bloodshed stop."

Dr. Koussevitzky believes music is a dominant factor in preserving our national morale. "Hordes of unholy forces have attacked, invaded and imperilled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressors and their devastating demoralizing forces. As we know, this is a war of the people as much as of the soldier. Every atom of artistic effort must be mobilized and thrown into action."

He cites Russia as a vivid example where art is used as a weapon of war, "Artists go to the front in the heat of battle where they witness true heroism, and learn to know what is life and death, love and hatred." Thus by experiencing the depth of human emotion the artist is able to give an illuminating account of it, Dr. Koussevitzky asserts.

A program of wide appeal, including selections by Mozart, Beethoven, Debussy and Ravel, has been arranged for the concert.



DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAR 19 1943

The Boston Symphony broadcast of Saturday, February 27 presented the first performance of the Third Symphony of Roy Harris. Recently Mr. Harris received a letter forwarded to him from the Soviet Embassy in Washington. It contained a request for his photograph and for some notes on his own compositions. It was written by Professor Igor Boelza, who is writing a book on American music for Russian readers. The Russian musicologist wrote that he had lectured extensively on American music and American composers and that Mr. Harris's first piano sonata had been performed in an all-American program under the auspices of the Union of Soviet Composers. He concluded his letter as follows: "On behalf of Soviet composers I salute you in these hard days of Second World War. We hope that our great peoples will stand to the utmost limit of our combined resources to make the world for all time a safe place for democracy and free art."

Preview of New Violin Concerto—N

Ruth Posselt Discusses Work She Will Play With Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"I like this piece of music," said Ruth Posselt, the violinist, "because when taking part in it I really play; I do not just saw wood."

She was speaking of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Vladimir Dukelsky, which she helps bring out at this week's performances of the Boston Symphony under the direction of Richard Burgin, Assistant Conductor. In the green room of Symphony Hall after rehearsal the other morning, both Mme. Posselt and Mr. Burgin gave a show-down of the papers in the case. First she, opening out a manuscript on the table, displayed the array of notes she has committed to memory for her task as soloist.

"My violin," she explained, "will not be overpowered by the instruments behind me on the platform. I have had the experience, more than I like, of trying to make myself heard against the noise, if I may call it that, of too much orchestra; but I shall not be at that disadvantage here, because the composer has had regard for his proportions."

* * *

Mme. Posselt remarked that the Dukelsky Concerto is the ninth modern work of the sort that she has assisted in producing in the last five seasons. "Mr. Dukelsky," said she, "was present when I appeared in New York as soloist in the Hindemith Concerto, the Barber Concerto, and the Piston Concerto, and he asked me to look at this one as he had sketched it out for violin with accompaniment of piano. Then Dr. Koussevitzky requested me to study it; and here I am, ready for the first public presentation.

"From being with the work from the start, I know it was composed in 1940 and 1941, and that it has since been scored for orchestra. It has been scored with such care, too, that the solo part has a fair chance, right through, of reaching the audience. I won't say that the orchestral filling-in is thin and light; I will say, rather, that it is transparent. The composer tells all he wants to with a minimum of accompanying sonority. His concerto, by that manner of writing, has a good deal the character of chamber music."

Turning over the pages of her solo, Mme. Posselt commented on the movements:

"'Allegro Molto'; quite serious in this opening division, and not too obvious in melody. Then see here for the second movement, 'Waltz'; observe the beginning, with pizzicati chords for the violin, slowly marking out the triple rhythm. Unusual procedure, if my acquaintance with works of the kind is anything to mention. Now look at the closing movement, which takes the form of theme and variations. I know of no other concerto that finishes off in that fashion."

* * *

At this point, she laid open the piano score which her accompanist has used, assisting her in preparation of the concerto in the studio. But what idea does a piano outline provide of an orchestral plan? Right at hand, however, lay the full score, which Mr. Burgin had been using at the preliminary running-through with the Symphony men. Interesting document, and original, indeed, the notes for the various instruments being set down, as if provisionally, in lead pencil, and the solo part emerging from the middle of the page in red ink, as though predetermined and there to stay.

Here, sure enough, was music in the process of making. But Mme. Posselt herself may almost be referred to as having had a hand in the business. For she undertook practice of the concerto last summer when residing at the music school which Dr. Koussevitzky maintained in the Berkshire Hills at Stockbridge, Mass. With her at that time, Mary Tower, pianist, collaborated. Mme. Tower, for that matter, has worked in the capacity of accompanist for Mme. Posselt in all nine of the modern concertos of her repertory. In the past winter's study of the Dukelsky Concerto, Luise Vosgerchien by alteration of circumstances, has taken on the duty of playing the piano at the practice hour.

Jay Florian Mitchell

Vladimir Dukelsky

Whose Violin Concerto is being played by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the symphony concerts in Cambridge tonight and in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. As Vernon Duke, Mr. Dukelsky is also the composer of the score for the musical show, "Dancing in the Streets," which comes into the Shubert Theater Monday night.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS SYMPHONY PLAYED

New York Times

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Leopold Stokowski added to the valuable service he has done in his current series of NBC broadcasts by reminding us, at yesterday's program from 8H, that Ralph Vaughan Williams wrote a remarkable symphony in F minor during the mid-thirties. The meditative lyric quality that one associates with the composer of the "Pastoral" and "London" symphonies is here augmented by a kind of personal forcefulness that makes Vaughan Williams seem a big man indeed on the musical horizon.

The strength of this utterance, its dark and brooding intensity, were powerfully conveyed by Mr. Stokowski's vigorous treatment. There was an impressive understanding of the grim mood in which the work was created, and a stirring presentation of it through the orchestra. All in all, in playing such works as this and the Stravinsky and Hindemith symphonies heard on other recent broadcasts, Mr. Stokowski has utilized his abilities and the resources of his command in a wholly admirable way.

There is little music that would fare well in juxtaposition to this challenging symphony, and Mr Stokowski chose as wisely as he might have in following it with two marches Morton Gould has evolved from war songs of China and Russia. They are titled "New China March" and "Red Cavalry March," and they serve their patriotic purpose well. The program closed with Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

At Carnegie Hall earlier in the day, Efrem Kurtz had another afternoon with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, again with Efrem Zimbalist as the violin soloist. Mr. Kurtz seemed better adjusted to the acoustical surroundings than at his earlier concerts this week, presenting a modest, well-planned performance of the Haydn symphony in G variously called No. 13 and 88. His gift for rhythmic, vivacious music was well employed in a version for orchestra of Liszt's "Grande Galop Chromatique" by Harold Byrns. Mr. Zimbalist played the Tchaikovsky concerto with ardor and affection, and with generally well-disciplined technic.

Russian music made up all of the program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, with Serge Koussevitzky adding to the current attention to the works of Serge Prokofiev by presenting his third piano concerto, with Alexander Borovsky as his soloist. There was all of the finesse and efficiency of the Boston Symphony in the performance, but it impressed me as a remarkably misconceived undertaking. Mr. Borovsky's tone production had little to do with the percussive, driving sound needed to distinguish the piano from the orchestral background, and his whole estimate of the work was deficient in humor and incisiveness. It was treated too much in the romantic nineteenth century tradition for justice to Prokofiev. Mr. Koussevitzky began with the Symphony No. 21 of Miaskovsky, a singularly unaffected, sincere and ingratiating work, which has much more to commend it than many more pretentious contemporary works. It was superbly played, as was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade," which completed the concert.

Koussevitzsky Pays Tribute to Rachmaninoff

Globe

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, learned only today of the death of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was a personal friend, and he immediately wrote the following tribute:

"Seigei Rachmaninoff is dead. The sorrowful news reaches the world. Its reality opens up a profound emptiness—an emptiness that cannot be filled. . . .

"The world of music mourns a master of towering stature, who was a symbol of dignity, integrity and inmost conscience in music. Indeed, he will be thus remembered.

"Admired and esteemed as he was throughout the world, he remained unassuming, reserved, outwardly detached yet inwardly aching for suffering humanity. Only those who were close to him knew the full measure of his tender devotion.

"These last years of world cataclysm weighed heavily upon him, so sensitive and great was his heart.

"To him, death comes as a delivery from the nightmare into which the present war has thrown the world.

"To us, the loss is even greater to bear because today of all times one like Sergei Rachmaninoff—an artist of his unique genius and his profound conscience—cannot be spared."

SKETCHES

Our Gracious Ladies

By NATALIE GORDON

Acclaimed by critics the greatest woman violinist in the world, Boston's own Ruth Posselt will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, and has been chosen by composer Vladimir Dukelsky (Vernon Duke) to introduce his new Concerto in G minor for Violin and Orchestra, which will have its world premiere tomorrow and which is dedicated to Ruth Posselt. . . . Ruth is one child prodigy who completely fulfilled the promise of her youth. Born and brought up in Medford, she snuggled her first violin under her chin when she was 3, made her debut at Carnegie Hall in New York when she was 8, and was a veteran concert artist in her early teens. . . . She studied with Ondricek here and in New York, and also with Jacques Thibaud, with whom she later toured Europe. . . . All in all, she has made 8 separate tours of Europe and admits with a twinkle in her eyes that she probably made some kind of a record by making 40 appearances in tiny little Holland alone! . . . She played with the Paris Symphony under Monteux, at Amsterdam with Mengelberg, with the Stockholm Philharmonic, and in 1936 made a memorable tour of Russia when she was only 21. She was the first American artist to tour the Soviet Union and found that country music mad. She saw Stalin and met and danced with Shostakovitch at a New Year's Eve banquet. Says he's marvelous as a composer, but on the dance floor he's no Fred Astaire. . . . In private life she is Mrs. Richard Burgin, wife of the concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony. . . . The Burgins live in Brookline, and Ruth is almost as fond of cooking as she is of music. Her particular pride is a baked soy noodle casserole the receipe for which she traded to Conductor George Szell last month for one of his cherished recipes. . . . Her most prized possession is her 1756 Guadagnini violin with which she wouldn't part for any number of Stradivariuses. . . . She has a long, golden bob, laughing brown eyes, a grand sense of humor, and claims that she's a very normal, ordinary sort of person for a musician. . . . Enjoys the movies, swimming, detective stories, and retiring late. . . . We found her friendly, charming, unassuming and completely lacking the airs and temperaments of many an artist. . . . As for Boston audiences she likes them better than New York ones, finding them more enthusiastic and inclusive of more young people.

(Tomorrow: The 1000th Gracious Lady!)

RUTH POSSELT

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
MAR 17 1943

A Message To The Russians: How Work Was Started On A Symphony

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

NEW YORK—Roy Harris was two years getting started on his fifth symphony, but when, after a summer in Colorado, he began work, it went swiftly. It was finished last Christmas morning, and the occasion was celebrated at Ithaca, where Harris is connected with the music department of Cornell University, by toasts from the student body, the composer's family, and sundry wayfarers not in either classification.

The work was played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, and the performance was radioed to the world, and particularly to Russia.

This was because the lanky Oklahoma composer has dedicated the work to the "heroic and freedom loving people of our great ally, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

It is a message from Roy Harris to those people, and it tries to convey in tone something of the character of our own people. There is more to us than our popular music expresses, Mr. Harris says.

* * *

"We also have qualities of heroic strength, will to struggle, faith in our destiny, determination," he declares. "We are possessed of a fierce driving power, and I am convinced that our mechanistic age has not destroyed an appreciation of more tender moods."

Dr. Koussevitzky has played the first performances of Mr. Harris' other symphonies. His listeners will find the first of its three movements martial, the second a chorale, but rhapsodic in style, and the last one of those supercomplicated affairs that Harris loves—a combination of Fugue and Rondo form, intricately written and intellectually interesting.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler's recent performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony came at an unlucky time. Specifically, it came on the day the orchestra announced through its head, Marshall Field, that when Dr. Artur Rodzinsky takes over next fall 17 familiar faces will be missing from the 103 which confront Philharmonic audiences from the stage of Carnegie Hall. Chief casualty is Mishel Piastro.

The men applauded Concertmaster Piastro roundly when he appeared on the stage, and understandably they played less well than they might have done for John Barbirolli in the program that followed. There was a feeling of tension, a lot of over-blowing, and a few unsteady spots.

It is now the fashion to remark, when Fritz Kreisler appears, that it would not matter whether he played violin at all, such is his dignity, poise and general nobility of bearing. This time Mr. Barbirolli had gracefully yielded the meat of the program to Kreisler, who played two concertos—his own in C major, and Viotti's in a minor.

And the news of the occasion was that the first of these is one of the long list of compositions that Kreisler wrote many years ago and credited slyly to composers out of the far past. It was supposed to have been a transcription from Antonio Vivaldi, and by odd chance this performance was the first by the Philharmonic.

M

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

Prokofieff Opus Heard

The Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall featured Alexander Borowsky, Russian pianist, in a brilliant reading of Prokofieff's Third Concerto.

The work is rattling good fun as well as wizardly art, with plenty of freshly seasoned bravura, fetching themes and saucy orchestral wit.

Few pianists could match Mr. Borowsky in clarifying line and detail as he did Saturday. Precision was second nature, and tart arabesques unfolded with point and glint.

Mr. Koussevitzky wove in a background bristling with fierce flashes of Prokofieffian power. The orchestra itself went completely virtuoso.

A second hearing of Miaskovsky's 21st Symphony brought out compact unity and thematic wealth in a clearer light. Without Shostakovich's bold sweep, the symphony gets its ideas over in masterly style, though it probably never will rank high in popularity.

While far from a novelty, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade sounded like one in Mr. Koussevitzsky's rendering Saturday. The exotic glow and fantasy of theme seemed fresh finds, and the orchestra richly evoked page after page of The Arabian Nights.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony make a trio hard to excel anywhere. The string passages alone were worth trudging through the midtown slush early Saturday afternoon.

L. B.

SPOT SHOTS

Traveler March 19 19[illegible]

JAM SESSION for servicemen musicians at the Servicemen's Center, Temple Place, is led by Arthur Fiedler, Boston "Pops" conductor, Fiedler, top left, concentrates on the score, and, top right, chats with Louis Zide, now of the Weymouth Air Base, and for eight years violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The clarinets are Pvts. Warren Hatch and William Ellison and Seaman David Weisman; the string bass, Corp. William Martin; the French horns, Julius Walker and Hyman Markowitz, and the drums Pvt. Emanuel Thomashow. Fiedler plans to make the event a weekly one.

Copley Plaza's Oval Room Attracts Large Audiences

Boris Goldovsky's Discussions Score Hit; Capt. Vernon Duke's Appearance Pleases

By ALISON ARNOLD

For many a Bostonian, the Symphony's Friday afternoon concerts now begin at 12:15 instead of 2:30. For at that hour a majority of the audience gathers in the Oval Room, at the Copley Plaza for the weekly Symphony Luncheon at which Boris Goldovsky discusses the concert to be presented that afternoon and illustrates his talk on the piano. He also undertakes to answer questions on the program and on related subjects if they are sent to him in advance.

Yesterday's large audience heard Mr. Goldovsky discuss Haydn's Symphony in C Minor No. 95, and Mahler's Symphony No. 3, and enjoyed the many amusing sidelights given on the characters of the self-made Haydn and the Svengali-like Mahler. But the highlight of the luncheon hour was the introduction of Capt. Vernon Duke, USCGR, whose Violin Concerto in G Minor, written under the name of Dukelsky, completes the current concert.

Capt. Duke, also the composer of hit tunes to be heard when "Dancing in the Streets" opens here next week, answered questions on his work in the fields of both classical and popular music. He lunched with Mrs. Goldovsky and at the next table was a large party including Mrs. John E. Yerxa with her young daughter, Constance, and Mrs. Richard Searle with her son, Richard, Jr. Also with them were Mrs. John Perrin, Mrs. Hamilton Edwards and Mrs. Walter McKim.

Mrs. Neil W. Rice came up from Hamilton with her young daughter, Anne, who looked very grown-up with a veil on the gray hat she wore with her fur coat. Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, wearing a spring-like sailor hat of black and white, came from Marblehead, and attractive, too, was Mrs. Augustus Lowell Putnam, who wore a white-trimmed navy sailor and had a bright green handkerchief tucked in the pocket of her navy suit.

Mrs. Weston Howland was in the enthusiastic audience and Mrs. Henry P. Benson was at a stage-side table as were Prof. Henry E. Clifford and his daughter, Miss Gretchen Clifford. Mrs. George Hawley, one of Boston's prominent music lovers, was at the table with Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, and deep in musical discussions were Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky and Mrs. Charles Alonzo Wessell.

Mrs. Robert Walcott and Mr. and Mrs. William Arms Fisher were others listening intently to Mr. Goldovsky's announcement that there will be no Symphony Luncheon next Friday, but that he will give a piano recital of Chopin's varying works the following Friday when the Symphony concert is omitted.

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 23 1943

MUSIC

THE fourteen New York Philharmonic-Symphony players whose contracts have not been renewed have admitted the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra which Toscanini, when he was its conductor, said was the greatest he had ever conducted; but they have charged that they were being made the scapegoats for the errors which had caused this deterioration—the management's errors first in engaging "a young and talented man" who could not handle "the tremendous burden of a complete season's work," then in trying "a bewildering variety" of guest conductors, each with his "pet hobby horses and . . . modern works" that could not be adequately rehearsed. And on the other hand they have charged the management with "premeditated and cultivated terrorism for years, with waves of firings anticipating any demands for betterment of contract," and have contended that the present dismissals are part of the management's tactics in its attempt to cut the length of the season. By the management I take it they have meant both the board of directors and Arthur Judson, the business manager; and Mr. Judson specifically they have charged with neglecting the best interest of the orchestra for the best interest of Columbia Concerts Corporation, through which he manages conductors and other concert artists. As for Artur Rodzinski, the newly engaged permanent conductor of the orchestra, they have contended that he recommended the dismissals "for reasons of intrigue and politics and not for the good of the orchestra," and that the recommendations represented "the arbitrary caprices of a man . . . well known . . . as completely unstable temperamentally." And as protection against all this they have demanded a committee of the orchestra empowered to review these and future dismissals.

It is true that in engaging Barbirolli, in giving a minor English conductor of a provincial Scottish orchestra a three-year contract as sole permanent conductor of a great orchestra that had been headed by Toscanini, in doing this not merely after he had been here few weeks on trial and had exhibited his undistinguished achievements but even, secretly, before he had come here, in re-engaging him for two more years even after those three years of amply demonstrated mediocrity, in passing over Beecham while it engaged Mitropoulos and even an Efrem Kurtz as guest conductor—in all this the management has proved its unfitness to control the orchestra's affairs. Nor has it proved its fitness now in my opinion, by engaging a man whose work has shown him to be a good drillmaster but a coarse-grained musician. By the management I too mean both the directors and Mr. Judson; for I think it reasonable to assume that where the directors' qualifications for their posts are their money, business standing, or social position, Mr. Judson's activity has not been limited to issuing stamps and petty cash. And with no knowledge of particular incidents which the fourteen players may have in mind I think it reasonable for them to contend that the man who has conductors and other artists for hire should not have anything to do with the hiring of conductors and other artists for the orchestra.

On the other hand the charge of waves of firings to terrorize the men is untrue: there have been, since the 1928 merger, only the few replacements that are normally made in an orchestra each year. And if one examines this year's list one finds that seven of the fourteen men have been playing in the New York Symphony and Philharmonic for periods long enough to make it credible that they are being retired and pensioned for age and lessened competence; one has been associate solo horn for the past two seasons, and presumably made his contribution to the sour notes I heard in Berlioz's "Queen Mab"; and one was tried as solo trombone this season, and may also have proved unsatisfactory. That leaves five, including the concertmaster: hardly a mass firing, and not without possible explanation.

At the time when the Philharmonic-Symphony was conducted by Toscanini and was a great orchestra there were men who liked to play under him; but there were also men who disliked it and who were glad to see him go. They could tell you of his rages; but he could tell you of their enraging indolence and unwillingness to put into their work the intensity of effort that he put into his. What with his personal force and rages and disciplinary power he compelled them to play like a great orchestra; but the next week one attended a concert at which they were conducted by a man with less personal force and no disciplinary power, one saw the concertmaster relax comfortably in his chair and the others behind him do likewise, and one heard playing in which one could not recognize the orchestra that Toscanini thought so great. This illustrated the conflict of wills that is involved in the conducting of any orchestra—but also the lack in these particular men of the pride in their standing that has caused the Boston and Philadelphia men to maintain a minimum excellence under other conductors than Koussevitzky and Stokowski. In this conflict the Philharmonic-Symphony men lost to Toscanini, but won over the others, and continued to win over Barbirolli and some of the recent guest conductors; and they are now trying to win over Rodzinski. They talk of the management's errors; but the men who were glad to see Toscanini go in 1936 were glad to see Barbirolli come; they had a grand time with him, and continued to have a grand time with the guest conductors, and would like to go on having a grand time with Rodzinski. Faced with a conductor who has been given disciplinary power and has begun to use it, they are executing a manoeuvre to deprive him of it. If they are successful and he surrenders on these and future dismissals I can't see him achieving much with the orchestra; if he wins he will have to work with a sullen orchestra; but even in the best circumstances his achievements would be limited by his capacities. In the best circumstances we would not get another Boston or Philadelphia Orchestra; for that we would have to have a different orchestra, a different conductor, and—while we were at it—a different board of directors and a different business manager.

B. H. HAGGIN

SYMPHONY BILL QUITE EVENTFUL

Haydn, Dukelsky, Wahler Represented

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Eventful is the word for this week's pair of Symphony concerts, conducted by Richard Burgin. The first portion of the programme consists of Haydn's C minor Symphony, No. 95, unheard at Symphony Hall since 1916, and Vladimir Dukelsky's violin concerto, which received its first public performance at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening with Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Burgin) as soloist. Also new to Boston yesterday was the remaining item on the list, the long first movement of Mahler's huge Third Symphony.

Vladimir Dukelsky occupies a unique position in the contemporary musical scene. As "Vernon Duke" he writes musical comedies and music for the films and next Tuesday evening he will enjoy another world premiere when his "Dancing in the Streets" is brought out at the Shubert Theatre.

It is natural to look for traces of Duke in the music of Dukelsky. The third movement of the concerto, a theme and variations, affords a glimpse or two, and the middle movement, a waltz, is at least free from seriousness though it avoids the commonplace. The first movement, the soundest of the three, is pure Dukelsky.

But the latter by his own admission has no time for musical abstractions and the first two sections of this concerto have abundant charm and should commend themselves to the violinist eager for new material. On a first hearing the variations seemed fabricated and musically hardly worth the enormous trouble to which they put the solo player. Miss Posselt acquitted herself nobly here and elsewhere and there was great applause for her as well as for the composer, who looked very smart in his coast guard uniform.

Mr. Burgin has worked faithfully for Mahler hereabouts but he did that perplexing composer some disservice by isolating this movement in the first place and putting it at the end of a programme in the second. To be sure, Mahler called this movement "part one" and lumped the other five as "part two," but its effect is that of a sort of vast preluding and it is bound to make a very different and far more satisfactory impression when heard as he intended it.

Heavily scored on the brass side, it provides a field day for horns, trumpets and trombones and there was much virtuoso playing yesterday. The movement abounds in remarkable orchestral effects that range, Mahler-like, from the beautiful to the bizarre. Its general tenor is martial, now cheerful, now funeral and, like most else that Mahler wrote, it cannot be appraised just as music. There is mysticism here with man and nature as its theme. Though the thread of the composer's discourse is at times hard to follow there is a rousing conclusion which yesterday brought down at least a large proportion of the house—there will be dissenting opinions over Mahler until the end of time.

When all is said, Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for giving us even this much of the Symphony and he is to be warmly commended for restoring to us the fine Symphony of Haydn which shows that genial symphonist in a somewhat more serious light. Yesterday it set the keynote for an afternoon of beautiful playing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KEOKUK, IA.
GATE CITY
MAR 23 1943

Music a Dominant Need at Present, Declares Famous Symphony Leader

"Music is a dominant need of our time," said the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, at a recent symposium at Town Hall in New York City. That states what the Keokuk Civic Music Association feels as it starts its campaign this week.

Tonight there will be a dinner at 6:30 o'clock at the Hotel Iowa at which the workers in the campaign will receive their instructions for seeing Keokuk people and giving them an opportunity to provide for good music in Keokuk during the 1943-1944 season.

Koussevitsky also said, "Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort and to inspire. In these stormy, perilous days it is the mission of art to protect the fundamental values for which our armies are fighting, to shelter the ennobling, everlasting treasures of art, to maintain the high standard of morale, of culture and thought.

"Music is a living and active force which is essential for preserving the burning spirit and the lasting aspirations and ideals.

"We have to fulfill the great and pressing task of carrying the torch of art and inspiration to the battle-front.

"Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

"Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man.

"Let us conquer darkness with the burning light of art."

Miami

MUSIC

20/1943

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

As one has remarked before—and probably will again—leave it to Richard Burgin to arrange an unusual Boston Symphony program in which the interest of unfamiliar old music is blended with the spice of a modern novelty.

Once again deputizing for Serge Koussevitzky at the helm of the orchestra, Mr. Burgin offered yesterday afternoon, as he will tonight, a Haydn Symphony last played at these concerts in 1916: the C minor, No. 95 and twelfth in the Salomon series; Vladimir Dukelsky's Violin Concerto, and for the first time in Boston, the first part (or movement, whichever term you prefer) of the Third Symphony by Gustav Mahler.

Apart from a single performance at Sanders Theatre last Thursday evening, the Dukelsky Concerto was played for the first time yesterday. The soloist was Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Richard Burgin), who gave a superb account, in technic and musicianship, of what must be a very difficult piece. Her tone throughout was lustrous, clear and of tropical warmth.

In the allegro molto, waltz and theme with variations which form the three movements, Mr. Dukelsky obviously wanted to write an effective solo part that would not be obscured or dominated by the orchestra. He succeeded, perhaps too well, because the orchestral part, involving a much reduced symphonic ensemble, is subdued to the point of meagerness. The solo writing is indeed effective, and it is alternately melodic and rhythmic.

But one missed the contrast of solo and concerted passages, the dialogue, the give and take and solidity which are the vitalizing traits of the concerto style. Dukelsky's idiom has its harmonic acidities, but it is far from dry or forbidding.

There are moments when the music sounds fabricated rather than inspired, but on the whole the composer has produced a striking vehicle for virtuoso fiddlers. Mr. Dukelsky, attirded in his Coast Guard uniform, appeared on the stage and shared in the applause which followed the peerformance.

Without doubt it is unfair to make general criticism of a symphonic movement heard by itself and divorced from its context. Symphonies are organic entities, intended to be heard entire. The first movement of the Mahler Third sounds like a vast and impressive introduction to more that is to follow. Hearing it alone leaves one with a sense of incompletion.

This writer is perforce bound to raise again the question: Why could not the whole Third Spmphony have been prepared and, if necessary, given on a program all by itself? Performance of isolated movements suggests so-called popular concerts rather than the regular series of a first rank orchestra. Nevertheless, to Mr. Burkin goes one's gratitude even for so little unfamiliar Mahler.

Starting with the swinging tune of an old Austrian boys' marching song, the movement reveals a prodigality of repetition, of endless color and marvelous orchestration in its long course. There are pages of greatness wherein you recognize the intense and profound Mahler of the Ninth Symphony and "Song of the Earth."

His predilection for marches is indulged over and over again, and some interludes have the bouncing resilience of a John Philip Sousa. Why he sought thus to express the awakening in Suring of the spirit of Pan or Dionysius eludes this devoted Mahlerite.

There are also many solos for horn, trumpet and trombone, even bass drum. There are the familiar ornamental passages for wood winds, the frequent changes of metrical and rhythms. In short this is music only for a virtuoso orchestra such as the Boston Symphony.

Haydn's bright, sophisticated Symphony was utterly charming. Just why it—and other slumbering items of the Salomon series — should be neglected is just as unanswerable as "How old is Ann?" In spite of a good deal of brilliant playing, one came away with the impression that Mr. Burgin did not obtain from the orchestra as much finesse as he usually does.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 20 1943

A NEW symphony by Roy Harris—the distinguished composer's fifth—was recently brought to town by the Boston Symphony under the persuasive direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This latest Harris symphony began strikingly but became less absorbing as it went along.

Violin soloists provided some exceptional fiddling last week. Joseph Szigeti, appearing with the Philadelphia Orchestra, played the fifth Mozart concerto and the first Prokofieff concerto in his familiar fashion, which means with sensitivity and skill. Efrem Zimbalist, collaborating with the Philharmonic-Symphony, contributed the Beethoven concerto, which he played magnificently. At Town Hall, a young man named Joseph Rabushka, who is only fourteen, made an unusually impressive début.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL
MAR

Famous Music Center Closes For Duration

BOSTON, March 20. — The Berkshire Music center will suspend its activities temporarily, owing to war conditions. The decision was made by a committee including members of the board of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Berkshire Symphonic festival and the Koussevitzky Music foundation.

In announcing the suspension, Dr. Koussevitsky said: "Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed. But after this period of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages will turn to the Berkshire Music center . . . deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music."

Plans are progressing already to reopen the center as soon as conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

In Piano Program

Mary L. Craig will present the following piano students in recital today at 3 p. m. at her residence studio: Alva Lee Brown, Gwendolyn Maine, Corrine Smith. Margaret Zwald and Robert Nottingham.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 19th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Ruth Posselt was the violin soloist in the Dukelsky Concerto. The program was as follows:
Haydn.....Symphony No. 95, in C minor
Dukelsky.....Violin Concerto in G minor
Mahler.....Symphony No. 3 (first part)

Despite the seeming severity of the reservations to follow, Vladimir Dukelsky has indeed written a violin concerto in his new G minor which may well prove "a useful vehicle for the few fine violinists in quest of something to replace the slightly shopworn warhorses of their repertoire" (to quote Mr. Dukelsky himself). For, in addition to being remarkably well suited to the tonal and technical capacities of the violin, it is a wholly pleasant composition in a modern but not, fortunately, a mathematical idiom.

Purely as music for the violin, it deserves the highest praise. Indeed, we could go so far as to state (well aware of the absurdity of it), that slightly revised and performed unaccompanied, it could stand on its own feet as a sonata for violin. It will be most interesting to see the concerto when it is published in a reduction for violin and piano, for the impression will not down that the orchestra is pure upholstery notwithstanding the cleverness of some of the sonorities, such as bass clarinet and piccolo in duet.

In any case, the orchestra is seldom employed except as a variegated backdrop to the now lyric, now soaring and now brilliant tones of the solo violin. Frequently it falters even in that capacity, and we hear, in an isolated and often pointless fashion, this voice against that one, this sonority against that. There is seldom the impression of perfect integration of orchestra and soloist. On the other hand, it is quite possible the composer meant it to be that way. After all, there is no reason he shouldn't write a concerto in the original sense of the term as a showpiece for violin. It's just unexpected in these days, for it has long been proved that people can play the violin magnificently. Miss Posselt, for instance.

As for its musical material, that is another matter. It is frequently exceptionally pleasing, and it must be said it made its way readily with the audience, which applauded the composer as no other has been this season. The lyric theme of the first movement could almost have been written by a Rachmmaninoff, but its inconventional development could hardly be considered nostalgic. The cadenza seemed a bit over-long to us. Of the three movements the waltz seemed most successful, although the final variations (also a bit over long), offered a good deal of engaging music.

Of Miss Posselt's playing, it is only possible to speak in the most glowing terms. Her bowing has always been one of the marvels, and yesterday she outdid herself in the extraordinary fluency with which she changed from up-bow to down-bow, never cutting into the phrase or interrupting the tone. As always, her technic, her intonation and her feeling for the music were little short of perfection. She is, without exaggeration, one of the more exciting performers of the day in either sex.

The concert, which was performed with all the customary excellence of ensemble under Mr. Burgin's energetic leadership, began with the fine but seldom-heard C minor symphony of Haydn. Next week's equally interesting program lists William Schuman's "A Free Song"; Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, Guarnieri's "Aberture Concertante" (the composer conducting) and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

This Clipping From
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAR 26 1943

William Schuman Work

BOSTON, Mass., March 25.—The Secular Cantata, No. 2, A Free Song, by William Schuman, will have its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses under Serge Koussevitzky in Boston on March 26 and 27.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS
CALLER
MAR 21 1943

Tones and Overtones

America's First Fifth, A Roy Harris Symphony, Is Introduced to World

By KATHERYN PATE

America's first completely native Fifth Symphony has been composed. It has been successfully premiered, too, and dedicated to the fighting Russians, who took time out from their slaughter pen duties to hear the short wave broadcast of this new Roy Harris music.

The fomentation in music circles was extreme when Harris Fifth Symphony was first played in New York. Critics outwrote themselves and music pages bulged with the significant news. Gradually the word reached the outposts of civilization and people in Corpus Christi, Texas, awoke one morning to the blast of a trumpet and the beat of a drum It is a great day when a Fifth Symphony is composed.

This display of pleasure over Harris' latest composition is a bit reminiscent of the fireworks set-off when Dmitri Shostakovitch sent a dozen or more tin cans to America by plane last July. In the tin cans were about 200 frames of microfilm and on the microfilm was Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony. He, too, was a hero to the home-folks and again we were reminded that total war does not necessarily include a blackout of those things classed as cultural.

It was a dramatic dash across time and space that delivered the Russian's Seventh into Toscanini's hands. The little tin cans were flown from Moscow to Teheran. They moved by motor from Teheran to Cairo and thence by plane to America. In two weeks the microfilm had been enlarged to standard negatives, plates had been cut and advance copies had been run off.

Not Story-Book

There were no story-booktales involved with the composition of Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony. Even though his name has become the most important in contemporary American music, Harris remains as plain as an old high-top, lace shoe. His music, however, is highly intellectual, requiring a long intimacy to be appreciated. The popularity of his music among a public whose taste veers toward the shallow and superficial is considered a little strange. His "Andante," for example, is a hundred miles removed from Ravel's "Bolero," say, but its appeal to the masses is no less.

Perhaps it is because Harris is as native an American product as Abraham Lincoln or Carl Sandburg that his brother and sister Americans find in him a heroic streak fit for worship. He was born in a little Oklahoma log cabin on Lincoln's birthday in 1898. His parents, the pioneering Harrises, moved on out to San Gabriel Valley in California, built their own farm, when Roy was yet a lad. There he spent his boyhood, adolescence and early manhood.

By the time he was old enough to shave, Harris was farming on his own. With farming, he coupled a study of Greek philosophy. During the first World War he served as a private in the United States Army for one year. Then, when he returned to Southern California, he was determined to devote himself to study. At the Southern Branch of the University of California he began the study of harmony, in Hindu theology found his diversion. He was a butter and egg man during the day, the evenings he gave to school and books.

Harris had acquired only a passing acquaintance with harmony and theory when he went to Arthur Farwell, begged to become his pupil. Farwell was unaccustomed to taking students who knew little more than the musical alphabet and the elements of its grammar. But, he wrote later, "I was convinced that he would one day challenge the world. Aside from his manifest talent, my grounds for this belief lay in his mental vitality and breadth, in his insistence upon the subjecting of every accepted musical dictum and tradition to a searching scrutiny."

Through the generosity of a private patronage, Harris in 1926 went to Paris to study under Nadia Boulanger. Study in Paris was a necessity no musician could escape in those days. His first major work, Concerto for Piano, Clarinet and String-Quartet, was composed that year, French critics singled it out for praise. When the Concerto was recorded by Columbia and received a large and popular sale, Harris' star soared high in the musical heavens.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced Harris' Symphony: 1933" (his first) in February, 1934. This performance tempted Columbia to record this work as well. The Victor Co. literally rubbed its eyes and sat bolt upright. Here was a composer well worth cultivating. Victor recorded many of the succeeding Harris works, commissioned him to compose a special symphonic work for recording. It was an American overture, "Johnny Comes Marching Home," based on a famous Civil War tune. It was instantly popular and Mr. Harris, if you please, was a vogue. Commissions poured in, from orchestras, from solo instrumentalists from patrons of the arts.

Simple Roy Harris

Harris is not one of the long-haired boys, playing at being a musician. He is simple and unpretentious, essentially reticent, and feels out of place in New York. A greater part of his life has been spent in a secluded farm-house with books. He finds enormous fascination in reading, particularly philosophy and the social sciences. He plays tennis and chess.

His musical interests are in works of the 15th and 16th centuries, Dufay, des Pres, Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso. Among other composers, his greatest respect is for Bach and Beethoven. After Beethoven, he feels the art of music degenerated. The degeneracy, he believes, is most apparent in the works of such composers as Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Richard Strauss and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In 1934 the New York Philharmonic conducted a nation-wide radio poll for orchestral compositions. Roy Harris received the greatest number of votes among living composers, only a few votes less than the poll for the single favorite work, the Franck D-Minor Symphony.

MAR 25 1943

Boston Symphony to Play Schumann Work

The first performance of a new William Howard Schumann work, "A Free Song," secular cantata No. 2, for chorus and orchestra, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Saturday at 7:15 over KFEQ and Blue Network stations.

The composition is in two parts, "Too Long, America" and "Look Down, Fair Moon" in the first part and "Song of the Banner" as the second part. The choral work will be done by the Harvard glee club and the Radcliffe choral society, with G. Wallace Woodworth conducting.

Schumann, who was born in New York city 33 years ago, commands a high place in American music, despite his youth. His career has been encouraged and influenced by Doctor Koussevitzky.

Also to be heard during the broadcast will be the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. James G. McDonald will be the program commentator.

[56]

March MUSIC 20 1943

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe MUSIC March 20, 1943

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

As one has remarked before—and probably will again—leave it to Richard Burgin to arrange an unusual Boston Symphony program in which the interest of unfamiliar old music is blended with the spice of a modern novelty.

Once again deputizing for Serge Koussevitzky at the helm of the orchestra, Mr. Burgin offered yesterday afternoon, as he will tonight, a Haydn Symphony last played at these concerts in 1916: the C minor, No. 95 and twelfth in the Salomon series; Vladimir Dukelsky's Violin Concerto, and for the first time in Boston, the first part (or movement, whichever term you prefer) of the Third Symphony by Gustav Mahler.

Apart from a single performance at Sanders Theatre last Thursday evening, the Dukelsky Concerto was played for the first time yesterday. The soloist was Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Richard Burgin), who gave a superb account, in technic and musicianship, of what must be a very difficult piece. Her tone throughout was lustrous, clear and of tropical warmth.

In the allegro molto, waltz and theme with variations which form the three movements, Mr. Dukelsky obviously wanted to write an effective solo part that would not be obscured or dominated by the orchestra. He succeeded, perhaps too well, because the orchestral part, involving a much reduced symphonic ensemble, is subdued to the point of meagerness. The solo writing is indeed effective, and it is alternately melodic and rhythmic.

But one missed the contrast of solo and concerted passages, the dialogue, the give and take and solidity which are the vitalizing traits of the concerto style. Dukelsky's idiom has its harmonic acidities, but it is far from dry or forbidding.

There are moments when the music sounds fabricated rather than inspired, but on the whole the composer has produced a striking vehicle for virtuoso fiddlers. Mr. Dukelsky, attirded in his Coast Guard uniform, appeared on the stage and shared in the applause which followed the peerformance.

Without doubt it is unfair to make general criticism of a symphonic movement heard by itself and divorced from its context. Symphonies are organic entities, intended to be heard entire. The first movement of the Mahler Third sounds like a vast and impressive introduction to more that is to follow. Hearing it alone leaves one with a sense of incompletion.

This writer is peforce bound to raise again the question: Why could not the whole Third Spmphony have been prepared and, if necessary, given on a program all by itself? Performance of isolated movements suggests so-called popular concerts rather than the regular series of a first rank orchestra. Nevertheless, to Mr. Burkin goes one's gratitude even for so little unfamiliar Mahler.

Starting with the swinging tune of an old Austrian boys' marching song, the movement reveals a prodigality of repetition, of endless color and marvelous orchestration in its long course. There are pages of greatness wherein you recognize the intense and profound Mahler of the Ninth Symphony and "Song of the Earth."

His predilection for marches is indulged over and over again, and some interludes have the bouncing resilience of a John Philip Sousa. Why he sought thus to express the awakening in Suring of the spirit of Pan or Dionysius eludes this devoted Mahlerite.

There are also many solos for horn, trumpet and trombone, even bass drum. There are the familiar ornamental passages for wood winds, the frequent changes of metrical and rhythms. In short this is music only for a virtuoso orchestra such as the Boston Symphony.

Haydn's bright, sophisticated Symphony was utterly charming. Just why it—and other slumbering items of the Salomon series—should be neglected is just as unanswerable as "How old is Ann?" In spite of a good deal of brilliant playing, one came away with the impression that Mr. Burgin did not obtain from the orchestra as much finesse as he usually does.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 20 1943

A NEW symphony by Roy Harris—the distinguished composer's fifth—was recently brought to town by the Boston Symphony under the persuasive direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This latest Harris symphony began strikingly but became less absorbing as it went along.

Violin soloists provided some exceptional fiddling last week. Joseph Szigeti, appearing with the Philadelphia Orchestra, played the fifth Mozart concerto and the first Prokofieff concerto in his familiar fashion, which means with sensitivity and skill. Efrem Zimbalist, collaborating with the Philharmonic-Symphony, contributed the Beethoven concerto, which he played magnificently. At Town Hall, a young man named Joseph Rabushka, who is only fourteen, made an unusually impressive début.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 19th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Ruth Posselt was the violin soloist in the Dukelsky Concerto. The program was as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 95, in C minor
Dukelsky.....Violin Concerto in G minor
Mahler.....Symphony No. 3 (first part)

Despite the seeming severity of the reservations to follow, Vladimir Dukelsky has indeed written a violin concerto in his new G minor which may well prove "a useful vehicle for the few fine violinists in quest of something to replace the slightly shopworn warhorses of their repertoire" (to quote Mr. Dukelsky himself). For, in addition to being remarkably well suited to the tonal and technical capacities of the violin, it is a wholly pleasant composition in a modern but not, fortunately, a mathematical idiom.

Purely as music for the violin, it deserves the highest praise. Indeed, we could go so far as to state (well aware of the absurdity of it), that slightly revised and performed unaccompanied, it could stand on its own feet as a sonata for violin. It will be most interesting to see the concerto when it is published in a reduction for violin and piano, for the impression will not down that the orchestra is pure upholstery notwithstanding the cleverness of some of the sonorities, such as bass clarinet and piccolo in duet.

In any case, the orchestra is seldom employed except as a variegated backdrop to the now lyric, now soaring and now brilliant tones of the solo violin. Frequently it falters even in that capacity, and we hear, in an isolated and often pointless fashion, this voice against that one, this sonority against that. There is seldom the impression of perfect integration of orchestra and soloist. On the other hand, it is quite possible the composer meant it to be that way. After all, there is no reason he shouldn't write a concerto in the original sense of the term as a showpiece for violin. It's just unexpected in these days, for it has long been proved that people can play the violin magnificently. Miss Posselt, for instance.

As for its musical material, that is another matter. It is frequently exceptionally pleasing, and it must be said it made its way readily with the audience, which applauded the composer as no other has been this season. The lyric theme of the first movement could almost have been written by a Rachmmaninoff, but its unconventional development could hardly be considered nostalgic. The cadenza seemed a bit over-long to us. Of the three movements the waltz seemed most successful, although the final variations (also a bit over long), offered a good deal of engaging music.

Of Miss Posselt's playing, it is only possible to speak in the most glowing terms. Her bowing has always been one of the marvels, and yesterday she outdid herself in the extraordinary fluency with which she changed from up-bow to down-bow, never cutting into the phrase or interrupting the tone. As always, her technic, her intonation and her feeling for the music were little short of perfection. She is, without exaggeration, one of the more exciting performers of the day in either sex.

The concert, which was performed with all the customary excellence of ensemble under Mr. Burgin's energetic leadership, began with the fine but seldom-heard C minor symphony of Haydn. Next week's equally interesting program lists William Schuman's "A Free Song"; Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, Guarnieri's "Aberture Concertante" (the composer conducting) and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL
MAR 21 1943

Famous Music Center Closes For Duration

BOSTON, March 20. — The Berkshire Music center will suspend its activities temporarily, owing to war conditions. The decision was made by a committee including members of the board of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Berkshire Symphonic festival and the Koussevitzky Music foundation.

In announcing the suspension, Dr. Koussevitsky said: "Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed. But after this period of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages will turn to the Berkshire Music center . . . deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music."

Plans are progressing already to reopen the center as soon as conditions permit, and for assuring its continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

In Piano Program

Mary L. Craig will present the following piano students in recital today at 3 p. m. at her residence studio: Alva Lee Brown, Gwendolyn Maine, Corrine Smith, Margaret Zwald and Robert Nottingham.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS
CALLER
MAR 21 1943

Tones and Overtones

America's First Fifth, A Roy Harris Symphony, Is Introduced to World

By KATHERYN PATE

America's first completely native Fifth Symphony has been composed. It has been successfully premiered, too, and dedicated to the fighting Russians, who took time out from their slaughter pen duties to hear the short wave broadcast of this new Roy Harris music.

The fomentation in music circles was extreme when Harris Fifth Symphony was first played in New York. Critics outwrote themselves and music pages bulged with the significant news. Gradually the word reached the outposts of civilization and people in Corpus Christi, Texas, awoke one morning to the blast of a trumpet and the beat of a drum. It is a great day when a Fifth Symphony is composed.

This display of pleasure over Harris' latest composition is a bit reminiscent of the fireworks set-off when Dmitri Shostakovitch sent a dozen or more tin cans to America by plane last July. In the tin cans were about 200 frames of microfilm and on the microfilm was Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony. He, too, was a hero to the home-folks and again we were reminded that total war does not necessarily include a blackout of those things classed as cultural.

It was a dramatic dash across time and space that delivered the Russian's Seventh into Toscanini's hands. The little tin cans were flown from Moscow to Teheran. They moved by motor from Teheran to Cairo and thence by plane to America. In two weeks the microfilm had been enlarged to standard negatives, plates had been cut and advance copies had been run off.

Not Story-Book

There were no story-booktales involved with the composition of Roy Harris' Fifth Symphony. Even though his name has become the most important in contemporary American music, Harris remains as plain as an old high-top, lace shoe. His music, however, is highly intellectual, requiring a long intimacy to be appreciated. The popularity of his music among a public whose taste veers toward the shallow and superficial is considered a little strange. His "Andante," for example, is a hundred miles removed from Ravel's "Bolero," say, but its appeal to the masses is no less.

Perhaps it is because Harris is as native an American product as Abraham Lincoln or Carl Sandburg that his brother and sister Americans find in him a heroic streak fit for worship. He was born in a little Oklahoma log cabin on Lincoln's birthday in 1898. His parents, the pioneering Harrises, moved on out to San Gabriel Valley in California, built their own farm, when Roy was yet a lad. There he spent his boyhood, adolescence and early manhood.

By the time he was old enough to shave, Harris was farming on his own. With farming, he coupled a study of Greek philosophy. During the first World War he served as a private in the United States Army for one year. Then, when he returned to Southern California, he was determined to devote himself to study. At the Southern Branch of the University of California he began the study of harmony, in Hindu theology found his diversion. He was a butter and egg man during the day, the evenings he gave to scho[illegible] and books.

Harris had acquired only a passing acquaintance with harmony and theory when he went to Arthur Farwell, begged to become his pupil. Farwell was unaccustomed to taking students who knew little more than the musical alphabet and the elements of its grammar. But, he wrote later, "I was convinced that he would one day challenge the world. Aside from his manifest talent, my grounds for this belief lay in his mental vitality and breadth, in his insistence upon the subjecting of every accepted musical dictum and tradition to a searching scrutiny."

Through the generosity of a private patronage, Harris in 1926 went to Paris to study under Nadia Boulanger. Study in Paris was a necessity no musician could escape in those days. His first major work, Concerto for Piano, Clarinet and String-Quartet, was composed that year, French critics singled it out for praise. When the Concerto was recorded by Columbia and received a large and popular sale, Harris' star soared high in the musical heavens.

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced Harris' "Symphony: 1933" (his first) in February, 1934. This performance tempted Columbia to record this work as well. The Victor Co. literally rubbed its eyes and sat bolt upright. Here was a composer well worth cultivating. Victor recorded many of the succeeding Harris works, commissioned him to compose a special symphonic work for recording. It was an American overture, "Johnny Comes Marching Home," based on a famous Civil War tune. It was instantly popular and Mr. Harris, if you please, was a vogue. Commissions poured in, from orchestras, from solo instrumentalists from patrons of the arts.

Simple Roy Harris

Harris is not one of the long-haired boys, playing at being a musician. He is simple and unpretentious, essentially reticent, and feels out of place in New York. A greater part of his life has been spent in a secluded farm-house with books. He finds enormous fascination in reading, particularly philosophy and the social sciences. He plays tennis and chess.

His musical interests are in works of the 15th and 16th centuries, Dufay, des Pres, Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso. Among other composers, his greatest respect is for Bach and Beethoven. After Beethoven, he feels the art of music degenerated. The degeneracy, he believes, is most apparent in the works of such composers as Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Richard Strauss and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In 1934 the New York Philharmonic conducted a nation-wide radio poll for orchestral compositions. Roy Harris received the greatest number of votes among living composers, only a few votes less than the poll for the single favorite work, the Franck D-Minor Symphony.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAR 26 1943

William Schuman Work

BOSTON, Mass., March 25.—The Secular Cantata, No. 2, A Free Song, by William Schuman, will have its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses under Serge Koussevitzky in Boston on March 26 and 27.

This Clipping From
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS
MAR 25 1943

Boston Symphony to Play Schumann Work

The first performance of a new William Howard Schumann work, "A Free Song," secular cantata No. 2, for chorus and orchestra, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, Saturday at 7:15 ovef KFEQ and Blue Network stations.

The composition is in two parts, "Too Long, America" and "Look Down, Fair Moon" in the first part and "Song of the Banner" as the second part. The choral work will be done by the Harvard glee club and the Radcliffe choral society, with G. Wallace Woodworth conducting.

Schumann, who was born in New York city 33 years ago, commands a high place in American music, despite his youth. His career has been encouraged and influenced by Doctor Koussevitzky.

Also to be heard during the broadcast will be the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. James G. McDonald will be the program commentator.

[56]

Worcester Telegram Mar 24, '43

AT AUDITORIUM CONCERT

At Worcester Civic Music Association Concert in the Auditorium last night. Left to right: Charles A. Grosvenor, chairman of the association's talent committee; Arthur J. Dann, president; Mrs. Leon McDermid, secretary, Dr. Serge Koussevitzyk, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph C. Ordway, association treasurer.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SUPERLATIVE CONCERT

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Give Well-nigh Flawless Rendition of Handel Concerto, And Beethoven and Tschaikowsky's 'Fourths'

By LESLIE MOORE

The Civic Music Association presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Auditorium last night. It was the association's concluding offering of the season. The program:

Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture (Grave—Allegro)—Air—Allegro moderato
Beethoven Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major. Op. 60
I. Adagio; Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio; Un poco meno allegro
IV. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo
Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di Valse
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; Allegro
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

This great orchestra, a favorite in Worcester through the years, drew a capacity house last night and gave a superlative performance. It was a red-letter evening in the city's music season. Whatever your temporary opinion as you hear other high-ranking organizations in the symphonic field, no possible doubt whatever lingers as you hear the Boston. "There," you exclaim, "is the greatest orchestra in the world!" Any contrary viewpoint is born of prejudice or misjudgment, or both.

Superlative Handel

Where will you encounter a smoother, more competent or purer interpretation of Handel than that with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened last night's program? Handel, these days, is too often merely a handy specimen of music's early flowering which concert artists use to warm up while the audience gets settled. Other than his oratorios, which are pretty decently treated, Handel is known chiefly for hackneyed excerpts from otherwise forgotten operas, which are almost invariably made to sound like something on an old Edison record, with no variety or intelligence of presentation.

That is said to emphasize the beauty which characterized last night's tenth concerto grosso. The work, which is remarkably built of noble musical ideas, came to life with a sprightly treatment of tune, a succinct introduction and weaving of the solo and responding instrumental voices, and abundant tonal coloring. There were delightful shadings, notably an almost incredible diminuendo at the end of the aria; and the acceleration in the finale movement, working up from a delicate beginning, achieved rousing effect. Handel would have beamed with pleasure.

Well Polished Fourths

Neither of the two symphonies is generally ranked as its creator's greatest. Yet there were moments last night both in the Beethoven and Tschaikowsky when we could take oath that the composers never rose to such heights in any other writing. If it was the playing which induced that feeling, the more honor to the orchestra and the gentleman, one of the giants of this era's music, who conducts it.

Beethoven's well-knit Fourth was flawless. Notwithstanding its restless portions, it is generally a comfortable symphony, rich in fascinating melody and a masterpiece of thematic development. It moves from a leisurely introduction and awakening allegro, to a soothing adagio, and then on to a laughing vivace, winding up with a spirited finale. Beethoven the genius may be more evident elsewhere, but Beethoven the craftsman and painter is at his best here. The second movement, for example, is a serene stream of melody which the accompaniment ripples in the manner of a gentle breeze. The gay third, partly a string and woodwind dialogue, is a very human affair indeed. The final movement runs with easy speed to a satisfying conclusion. We heard all there is to hear in the symphony, which is compliment enough for any orchestra.

'Unforgettable" Scherzo

I suppose nobody in last night's audience will soon forget the performance of the Scherzo in the Tschaikowsky symphony. The third movement is, of course wonderfully written, and is abou as unusual today as the composer thought it was when he got it down on paper. But it isn't memorable unless somebody can be found to play it memorably. The strings of the Boston orchestra did it. It was astonishing. Pizzicato in ensemble, save for slow and measured stuff, is customarily sloppy. But here was miraculous precision. That isn't all. The Pizzicato, nimble and phenomenal, was nevertheless done with magnificent dynamics—loud, soft, gradual and abrupt. It was all-out musicianship and total technique.

Don't think the rest of the symphony wasn't something special. It was. Whether this is the top specimen of Russian spirit in the composer's output or not, I don't know or care much. It rises above nationalist limits. The Thomas Hardy of music is in there all the time harping away on inexorable fate and futility, no doubt, but he does it with thrilling results, and Dr. Koussevitzky took good care that the depressive aspects were not labored unduly.

Vigorous Andante

The opening andante came in with splendid vigor, and, following the curious waltz theme moved on to its tremendous brass passages and climaxes. The oboe and English horn gave beautiful emphasis to the flowing air of the second movement, over the rich accompaniments.

The scherzo I seem to have mentioned above. The finale, despite a common streak in the closing theme, especially when blared by the brasses, is an overpowering and exciting, impatient piece of music. The orchestra rose to the opportunities superbly with fiery intensity.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting was a delight to watch, naturally. No histrionics, no grandstanding. All music. Others have their spotlights and somersaults. He has his genius and a matchless orchestra. Ne needs nothing else.

CIVIC MUSIC SUBSCRIPTION RENEWAL APRIL 1

The renewal period for subscriptions for next season's Worcester Civic Music Concert Series will open April 1, Arthur S. Dann, president, announced yesterday.

All present members are eligible for renewals, and there will be openings for about 250 additional persons, he said. Membership will be limited to 3500.

The association will maintain headquarters in the Chamber of Commerce through April.

This Clipping From
EVERETT, MASS. NEWS GAZETTE

MAR 26 1943

CONCERT TO AID RUSSIAN RELIEF

Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Arthus Fiedler

The Russian Day Relief committee of Malden is sponsoring a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, Friday evening, April 30, at the Jenkins auditorium, Malden High school, and many Everett residents are planning to attend.

Word was received by Dr. Samuel G. Pavlo, chairman of the concert committee, that in appreciation of the gallant fight the Russian people are making and the great necessity of lending them a hand in their hour of need, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has voted 100 percent attendance. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Fiedler, in donating their services, express their willingness to alleviate the suffering of the Russian people.

It is the sincere hope of the Malden committee for Russian War Relief that the public will evince the same show of enthusiasm as did the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By attending this performance, the public will not only receive an evening of rare entertainment, but will also help the Russian people in their gallant fight for liberty.

Mrs. Samuel G. Pavlo, chairman of the ticket committee, made the announcement that a great demand for tickets has been made not only by Malden residents but by neighboring towns.

All those desiring tickets may procure them by calling Mrs. Samuel G. Salvo at Malden 5603-J.

Symphony Concert to Stress Inter-American Relations

Mar 25 Herald

Inter-American relations will be the timely under-current of the program Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has arranged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week-end. He is presenting first Boston performances of works by two North American composers, William Schuman and Aaron Copland, and one South American, Camargo Guarnieri. This young Brazilian also will appear as conductor of his own work. Hence the interest of the Pan-American Society, headed by Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck.

The program is to open with William Schuman's cantata, "A Free Song," in which a text selected from Walt Whitman's "Drum Taps" will be sung with the orchestra by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. They have been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. This will be the initial performance of the work.

Sibelius's Fifth Symphony will follow. The concert will resume after intermission with the conducting by Camargo Guarnieri of his own "Abertura Concertante" heard for the first time in Boston. Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," heard also for the first time here, will conclude the program. In its performance, words of Lincoln will be spoken by the distinguished young actor, Will Geer, who has found time to publish a book, "American Folk Songs."

The membership of the Pan American Society includes numerous regular patrons of the concerts, among them Miss Fanny Adams, Mrs. Talbot Aldrich, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, Mrs. Russell S. Codman, Mrs. Guy W. Currier, Mrs. Louis Curtis, Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Isabella Grandin, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Christian A. Herter, Mr. and Mrs. Richard B. Hobart, Mrs. Parkman D. Howe, Jr., Mrs. Richard Saltonstall, Mrs. George C. Shattuck, Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth and Mrs. Langdon Warner.

Pan American Society members who also are enrolled as Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Mrs. Henry L. Beveridge, Miss Susan Godoy, Mrs. L. Cushing Goodhue, Miss Constance Goodrich, Miss Fanny P. Mason, Gov. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mr. and Mrs. Jesus Saaroma, Mrs. Edward Thaw and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth.

The music committee of the society consists of the following group of Symphony-goers: Miss Susan Godoy, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. George Hawley, Mrs. Richard Hobart, Mrs. Chester Humphrey, Mrs. Edward Taft, Mrs. Edward Thaw and Mrs. Langdon Warner. Miss Isadora Falcao of the committee is the daughter of the Brazilian consul, Senhor Ildefonso Falcao. Other members of the group are Mr. George Wright Briggs, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mr. Quincy Porter, composer and director of the New England Conservatory of Music; and Mr. Nicholas Slonimsky, composer and musicologist, noted authority on Latin-American music.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME. PRESS HERALD

MAR 27 1943

Brazil Composer Leads Boston Symphony

Boston, March 26—(UP)—Camargo Guarnieri, one of Brazil's outstanding composers, today conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Boston performance of his new overture, Abertura Concercante, at Symphony Hall.

The orchestra also gave the premiere performance of a Cantata by William Schuman, A Free Song. The choral portion of the composition was sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Works by Brazilian Composer And Two Americans Scheduled

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Never heard a note of it," said William Howard Schuman, the composer, speaking of his music, "A Free Song," in the library of Symphony Hall last night. He could not express himself in those terms now, for he has heard the Boston Symphony men and the Harvard-Radcliffe choir of 150 voices run through the work under Dr. Koussevitzky, in preparation for its first public trials tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Thus does a man who has mastered the technique of composition write things out of his head and confidently set them before a conductor to lead and before instrumentalists and vocalists to perform. As for the full score, that stands in manuscript, though executed in the handsome manner of the professional copyist; and as for the vocal score, that stands in print, published by the house of G. Schirmer of New York, with a piano reduction for accompaniment.

* * *

Rather strangely, then, the men and women of Cambridge who have been studying the choruses for some time under their own music director knew more about the sound of it when they came to town for practice with the orchestra last night than the composer himself, unless what is heard with the ear of imagination may be called sound.

Whatever that may signify, along comes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule of doings a late-season novelty, "A Free Song," Secular Cantata No. 2, to words adapted from poems of Walt Whitman. It is a patriotic song, a song to the American Flag, a song of liberty. Structurally, it takes form as a kind of solemn movement contrasted with a vivacious one; carrying out the classic plan to the patriotic cause, is making the week still richer, presenting Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which amounts to a recitation with orchestral support, the text being salient passages from Lincoln's speeches, with the closing words of the Gettysburg Address as finale. The work will have its first Boston performance at this time, though it has been made generally known the radio way in a Kostelanetz program and it has been done in concert at Cincinnati,

But Dr. Koussevitzky goes further, undertaking something in the good-neighbor line. He has invited the Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri, to take part in the week's festivities; and Mr. Guarnieri will appear on Symphony Hall platform directing the orchestra in a work of his written last year entitled "Abertura Concertante." The work is described as a fairly strict study in the overture form, full of strains of Brazilian, or possibly Portuguese melody, shanties the sailors of Vasco da Gama may have hoisted sails to, and rhythms that peasants back in John the Great's day may have danced to.

Delar

William Schuman

Marcus Blechman

Camargo Guarnieri

MAMARONECK, N. Y.
TIMES

Concert Postponed

The concert scheduled for Friday in Paine Hall, at which Béla Bartók, assisted by Rudolf Kolesch, was to present a program of his own music, has been indefinitely postponed because of the continued indisposition of Mr. Bartók.

This Clipping From BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

MAR 28 1943

Boston Symphony In Final Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present the final concert of its series this season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, at 8:30. The program will feature Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," a musical characterization of Abraham Lincoln in which words from several speeches are used as a spoken text. The speaker will be the noted actor Will Geer.

Dr. Koussevitzky opens the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10, in D minor. He has also chosen the work of the American composer Pvt. Samuel Barber. It is Essay for Orchestra, No. 1.

The second half of the program will be devoted to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor. The series is held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

ton orchestra will repeat "A Fr Song" at Carnegie Hall in N York Saturday. The Radcliffe a Harvard choruses will accompa the orchestra to New York for t performance.

Mr. Schuman's reputation as composer reached nation-wide pr portions with the introduction his Third and Foutrh Symphoni (The Fourth was first played the Philadelphia Orchestra last A ril with Eugene Ormandy condu ing) but he was taking it all ve calmly in his office at Sarah La rence College this morning. He a member of the Arts' Facul there and director of the Sar Lawrence Chorus which w broadcast a program over the C lumbia Broadcasting System 2:15 on April 10.

He admitted that he was som what fatigued after having co muted between Boston and N York for three days. Wednesd he was in Boston for a rehears took the sleeper back to New Yo that night to attend the playi of "Prayer 1943" at Carnegie H Thursday night, went back to B ton Friday for the performan there Saturday, and returned New York Saturday night. Wh he was asked what the Bost newspapers had to say about premiere of his new work, Schuman replied, "I never read

Harold Stein

Aaron Copland

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "newsiest" part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon was the first performance here of Frederick Jacobi's "Ode" for Orchestra. But the part one remembers most vividly was Bernard Zighera's virtuoso performance of the solo part in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra.

These two works came on a program which, like that of a week ago, consisted of six numbers, and which otherwise included the D minor Organ Concerto, No. 10, by Handel, with E. Power Biggs as soloist; the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and the "Russian Easter Overture" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

While Debussy is often considered the composer par excellence for harp, especially when that graceful instrument is combined with orchestra, Ravel knew a thing or two about writing for it. His Introduction and Allegro is music of glittering brilliance in the solo part, and surely a virtuoso of the first order is demanded.

Mr. Zighera's performance, as one would expect from such a master of the instrument as the Boston Symphony's first harpist, was a marvel of speed, accuracy and deftness. It was just as brilliant as the music itself, which is one way of saying that nothing was left to be desired.

Hearing Mr. Zighera thus play the harp, one was reminded of an old regret: that many composers of the 19th century, with certain notable exceptions, underestimated the variety of beauties obtainable from an instrument which, in the right hands, can indeed "sing."

Mr. Biggs, too, as soloist in Handel's fresh and substantial Concerto, played admirably, with the stylistic mastery and the general musicianship for which he has come to be noted in this country.

It is a pleasure to report that the Symphony Hall organ, on certain past occasions grievously sagging in pitch, was in tune with the orchestra.

Mr. Jacobi's "Ode," composed two years ago and given its premiere in San Francisco last February, was inspired by a passage in the Hebrew Morning Sabbath Service. What is its musical form I could not begin to determine after a single performance, but there is unifying repetition of salient thematic ideas. And there is also a considerable variation in mood.

The idiom is neither old-fashioned nor radically modern, but reveals elements of each. The orchestration suggests examples from Debussy, a little of Strauss, hints from Sibelius in certain colorings and combinations, yet it is not exactly what could be termed eclectic.

To this writer, Mr. Jacobi's style is not very melodic, nor would one think of the "Ode" as specifically reflecting a mood of religious affirmation without having first read the composer's statement about the origin of the music. Yet the work is certainly ponderable, and will bear re-hearing.

While the "Russian Easter" Overture is surely heard at its festive best when Mr. Koussevitzky conducts it, the "Unfinished" Symphony and Wagner's mystic Prelude fared unevenly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is more successful with the "Unfinished" than with the C major Symphony of Schubert, and much of yesterday's reading had a supernal charm and simplicity. On the other hand there were passages that seemed to go a little awkwardly.

Wagner's dedicatory, philosophical and elusive music of "Parsifal" must be extremely difficult to conduct. Though music designed for the theatre, it is for a very special, ceremonial purpose and occasion. It should sound as an expression of faith and it ought to have a mystic glow.

Mr. Koussevitzky does not excel with Wagner, and though certain pages were beautifully done, one did not feel that all in the music was brought out.

The orchestral playing was, on the whole, superb, but the brass noticeably had an off day. Both soloists, and Mr. Jacobi, who appeared on the stage after performance of his "Ode," were roundly applauded.

While the afternoon concert of this week was given yesterday, because today is Good Friday, the evening concert will as usual take place Saturday at 8:15. Next week is the season will end. C. W. D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The beginning of the end of the Symphony season is in sight when the Monday-Tuesday series comes to a close. Last evening brought the final Monday presentation and this afternoon brings a repetition of a well-contrived programme consisting of a new Prelude and Fugue by Arcady Dubensky, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite of Ravel and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

One of the first violinists in the New York Philarmonic-Symphony, Russian-born Dubensky has been known to Boston through other orchestras, notably the Peoples' Symphony, but this was the first hearing of his music in Symphony Hall. It was also the first performance anywhere of this Prelude and Fugue.

Presumably the piece is new but there is nothing particularly modern in this idiom. In fact, the style seems to be a sort of blend of Tchaikovsky and Franck. The Prelude, short and solemn, is for strings alone; the Fugue, in slow tempo, is for full orchestra. There is a very long and immediately attractive subject, the treatment of which is free and harmonically and orchestrally rich. The audience made it quite plain that it liked the work and at its conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky escorted the composer to the platform.

The music of Ravel and Beethoven had already been heard this season in the longer series, but Debussy's Prelude had not, though, goodness knows, it is of frequent enough occurrence. Often as it has been played, however, it is not easy to recall a performance so exquisitely adjusted from the tonal standpoint or so charged with the piece's peculiar atmosphere and charm. As for the "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have a way with them that defies imitation. Ravel himself was only too ready to admit it.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantastique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

Local Composer Hears Boston Symphony Give Premiere Of His Work

WILLIAM SCHUMAN

New York Philharmonic Also Presents Another Schuman Composition 3 Times

The world premiere of one major orchestral composition by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the presentation three times in four days of another new work by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is a distinction which comes rarely, if a all, to an American composer. In fact, although there are no vital statistics on the subject, it is probably safe to say that it has never happened before. The young composer who enjoyed that unique distinction over the week-end is William Schuman of 17 Springdale Road, Woods of Larchmont.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance Saturday night of Mr. Schuman's new work: "A Free Song, Secular Contata No. 2 for Chorus and Orchestra." The orchestra was assisted by the choruses from Radcliffe College and Harvard University. The contata is adapted from poems by Walt Whitman, the first movement based on "Long, Too Long America" and "Look Down, Fair Moon" and the second movement adapted from "Song of the Banner At Daybreak."

The audience at Symphony Hall in Boston gave the work an enthusiastic reception and Mr. Schuman shared the honors from the stage with Mr. Koussevitsky.

It was a Schuman weekend at Carnegie Hall in New York, too. Thursday night Fritz Reiner conducted the Philharmonic in a presentation of "Prayer 1943", a composition with no set program but indicative of the prayerful mood in which the people of America and the United Nations look forward to victory.

The program was repeated Friday and again yesterday afternoon during the regular Sunday afternoon broadcast of the Philharmonic. Mr. Reiner conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony in the world premiere of "Prayer 1943" in Pittsburgh in February.

MAIL POUCH

In Support of Harris

To the Music Editor:

A NENT Ferdinand Davis's comment on Roy Harris's Fifth symphony which you printed in last week's Hemidemisemiquavers, I should like to say that I believe that the quality of a work many times varies inversely with the critical panning which it elicits.

I heard this symphony and I thought it had many moments of genuine grandeur. To my mind a major work of an American composer can't get a square deal from America's omniscient critics.

RUTH BRECHER.

New York.

'SPRING' MOOD FOR SYMPHONY

Works by Schumann, Berlioz, Williams Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A touch of spring in the air gav appropriateness to the performance a yesterday's Symphony Concert c Schumann's "Spring" Symphony (hi First in B-flat major) and to the rc mantic ardors of Berlioz' "Harold i Italy" Symphony, with which the prc gramme concluded.

Less seasonal, or rather unseasons because of the cathedral-like atmos phere, was the first number. Vaugha Williams' Fantasia for string orchestr on a theme by Thomas Tallis. Th viola soloist in "Harold" was Jean Le franc, first violinist of the orchestra

With Berlioz' extraordinary work Dr Koussevitzky is making up for los time. Until last April, when he revived it for Louis Bailly, who had come to play a Viola Concerto by Berezowsky, the Symphony had gone unheard here since 1919. In matters of orchestration Berlioz was not merely years but decades ahead of his time. His musical thought was also prophetic. There is a freedom and plasticity in his tonal speech that is far removed from the measured periods of the classicists and Berlioz' fellow romanticists. It is hard to believe on the evidence of the scores themselves that "Harold in Italy" was composed in 1834 and Schumann's First in 1841.

[58]

Works by Brazilian Composer And Two Americans Scheduled

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Never heard a note of it," said William Howard Schuman, the composer, speaking of his music, "A Free Song," in the library of Symphony Hall last night. He could not express himself in those terms now, for he has heard the Boston Symphony men and the Harvard-Radcliffe choir of 150 voices run through the work under Dr. Koussevitzky, in preparation for its first public trials tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

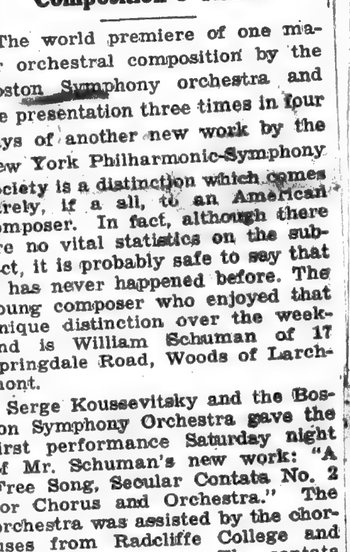
Thus does a man who has mastered the technique of composition write things out of his head and confidently set them before a conductor to lead and before instrumentalists and vocalists to perform. As for the full score, that stands in manuscript, though executed in the handsome manner of the professional copyist; and as for the vocal score, that stands in print, published by the house of G. Schirmer of New York, with a piano reduction for accompaniment.

* * *

Rather strangely, then, the men and women of Cambridge who have been studying the choruses for some time under their own music director knew more about the sound of it when they came to town for practice with the orchestra last night than the composer himself, unless what is heard with the ear of imagination may be called sound.

Whatever that may signify, along comes in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule of doings a late-season novelty, "A Free Song," Secular Cantata No. 2, to words adapted from poems of Walt Whitman. It is a patriotic song, a song to the American Flag, a song of liberty. Structurally, it takes form as a kind of solemn movement contrasted with a vivacious one; carrying out the classic plan to the patriotic cause, is making the week still richer, presenting Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which amounts to a recitation with orchestral support, the text being salient passages from Lincoln's speeches, with the closing words of the Gettysburg Address as finale. The work will have its first Boston performance at this time, though it has been made generally known the radio way in a Kostelanetz program and it has been done in concert at Cincinnati.

But Dr. Koussevitzky goes further, undertaking something in the good-neighbor line. He has invited the Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri, to take part in the week's festivities; and Mr. Guarnieri will appear on Symphony Hall platform directing the orchestra in a work of his written last year entitled "Abertura Concertante." The work is described as a fairly strict study in the overture form, full of strains of Brazilian, or possibly Portuguese melody, shanties the sailors of Vasco da Gama may have hoisted sails to, and rhythms that peasants back in John the Great's day may have danced to.



Delar

William Schuman

Marcus Blechman

Camargo Guarnieri

Concert Postponed

The concert scheduled for Friday in Paine Hall, at which Béla Bartók, assisted by Rudolf Kolesch, was to present a program of his own music, has been indefinitely postponed because of the continued indisposition of Mr. Bartók.

MAMARONECK, N. Y. TIMES

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y. EAGLE
MAR 28 1943

Harold Stein

Aaron Copland

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "newsiest" part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon was the first performance here of Frederick Jacobi's "Ode" for Orchestra. But the part one remembers most vividly was Bernard Zighera's virtuoso performance of the solo part in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra.

These two works came on a program which, like that of a week ago, consisted of six numbers, and which otherwise included the D minor Organ Concerto, No. 10, by Handel, with E. Power Biggs as soloist; the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and the "Russian Easter Overture" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

While Debussy is often considered the composer par excellence for harp, especially when that graceful instrument is combined with orchestra, Ravel knew a thing or two about writing for it. His Introduction and Allegro is music of glittering brilliance in the solo part, and surely a virtuoso of the first order is demanded.

Mr. Zighera's performance, as one would expect from such a master of the instrument as the Boston Symphony's first harpist, was a marvel of speed, accuracy and deftness. It was just as brilliant as the music itself, which is one way of saying that nothing was left to be desired.

Hearing Mr. Zighera thus play the harp, one was reminded of an old regret: that many composers of the 19th century, with certain notable exceptions, underestimated the variety of beauties obtainable from an instrument which, in the right hands, can indeed "sing."

Mr. Biggs, too, as soloist in Handel's fresh and substantial Concerto, played admirably, with the stylistic mastery and the general musicianship for which he has come to be noted in this country.

It is a pleasure to report that the Symphony Hall organ, on certain past occasions grievously sagging in pitch, was in tune with the orchestra.

Mr. Jacobi's "Ode," composed two years ago and given its premiere in San Francisco last February, was inspired by a passage in the Hebrew Morning Sabbath Service. What is its musical form I could not begin to determine after a single performance, but there is unifying repetition of salient thematic ideas. And there is also a considerable variation in mood.

The idiom is neither old-fashioned nor radically modern, but reveals elements of each. The orchestration suggests examples from Debussy, a little of Strauss, hints from Sibelius in certain colorings and combinations, yet it is not exactly what could be termed eclectic.

To this writer, Mr. Jacobi's style is not very melodic, nor would one think of the "Ode" as specifically reflecting a mood of religious affirmation without having first read the composer's statement about the origin of the music. Yet the work is certainly ponderable, and will bear re-hearing.

While the "Russian Easter" Overture is surely heard at its festive best when Mr. Koussevitzky conducts it, the "Unfinished" Symphony and Wagner's mystic Prelude fared unevenly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is more successful with the "Unfinished" than with the C major Symphony of Schubert, and much of yesterday's reading had a supernal charm and simplicity. On the other hand there were passages that seemed to go a little awkwardly.

Wagner's dedicatory, philosophical and elusive music of "Parsifal" must be extremely difficult to conduct. Though music designed for the theatre, it is for a very special, ceremonial purpose and occasion. It should sound as an expression of faith and it ought to have a mystic glow.

Mr. Koussevitzky does not excel with Wagner, and though certain pages were beautifully done, one did not feel that all in the music was brought out.

The orchestral playing was, on the whole, superb, but the brass noticeably had an off day. Both soloists, and Mr. Jacobi, who appeared on the stage after performance of his [illegible]," were roundly applauded.

While the afternoon concert of [illegible] week was given yesterday, because today is Good Friday, the evening concert will as usual take place Saturday at 8:15. Next week will end the season. C. W. D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The beginning of the end of the Symphony season is in sight when the Monday-Tuesday series comes to a close. Last evening brought the final Monday presentation and this afternoon brings a repetition of a well-contrived programme consisting of a new Prelude and Fugue by Arcady Dubensky, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite of Ravel and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

One of the first violinists in the New York Philarmonic-Symphony, Russian-born Dubensky has been known to Boston through other orchestras, notably the Peoples' Symphony, but this was the first hearing of his music in Symphony Hall. It was also the first performance anywhere of this Prelude and Fugue.

Presumably the piece is new but there is nothing particularly modern in this idiom. In fact, the style seems to be a sort of blend of Tchaikovsky and Franck. The Prelude, short and solemn, is for strings alone; the Fugue, in slow tempo, is for full orchestra. There is a very long and immediately attractive subject, the treatment of which is free and harmonically and orchestrally rich. The audience made it quite plain that it liked the work and at its conclusion Dr. Koussevitzky escorted the composer to the platform.

The music of Ravel and Beethoven had already been heard this season in the longer series, but Debussy's Prelude had not, though, goodness knows, it is of frequent enough occurrence. Often as it has been played, however, it is not easy to recall a performance so exquisitely adjusted from the tonal standpoint or so charged with the piece's peculiar atmosphere and charm. As for the "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have a way with them that defies imitation. Ravel himself was only too ready to admit it.

Local Composer Hears Boston Symphony Give Premiere Of His Work

WILLIAM SCHUMAN

New York Philharmonic Also Presents Another Schuman Composition 3 Times

The world premiere of one major orchestral composition by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the presentation three times in four days of another new work by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is a distinction which comes rarely, if a all, to an American composer. In fact, although there are no vital statistics on the subject, it is probably safe to say that it has never happened before. The young composer who enjoyed that unique distinction over the week-end is William Schuman of 17 Springdale Road, Woods of Larchmont.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance Saturday night of Mr. Schuman's new work: "A Free Song, Secular Contata No. 2 for Chorus and Orchestra." The orchestra was assisted by the choruses from Radcliffe College and Harvard University. The contata is adapted from poems by Walt Whitman, the first movement based on "Long, Too Long America" and "Look Down, Fair Moon" and the second movement adapted from "Song of the Banner At Daybreak."

The audience at Symphony Hall in Boston gave the work an enthusiastic reception and Mr. Schuman shared the honors from the stage with Mr. Koussevitsky.

It was a Schuman weekend at Carnegie Hall in New York, too. Thursday night Fritz Reiner conducted the Philharmonic in a presentation of "Prayer 1943", a composition with no set program but indicative of the prayerful mood in which the people of America and the United Nations look forward to victory.

The program was repeated Friday and again yesterday afternoon during the regular Sunday afternoon broadcast of the Philharmonic. Mr. Reiner conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony in the world premiere of "Prayer 1943" in Pittsburgh in February.

Boston Symphony In Final Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present the final concert of its series this season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, at 8:30. The program will feature Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," a musical characterization of Abraham Lincoln in which words from several speeches are used as a spoken text. The speaker will be the noted actor Will Geer.

Dr. Koussevitzky opens the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10, in D minor. He has also chosen the work of the American composer Pvt. Samuel Barber. It is Essay for Orchestra, No. 1.

The second half of the program will be devoted to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor. The series is held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

[illegible]ston orchestra will repeat "A Free Song" at Carnegie Hall in New York Saturday. The Radcliffe and Harvard choruses will accompany the orchestra to New York for the performance.

Mr. Schuman's reputation as a composer reached nation-wide proportions with the introduction of his Third and Foutrh Symphonies. (The Fourth was first played by the Philadelphia Orchestra last April with Eugene Ormandy conducting) but he was taking it all very calmly in his office at Sarah Lawrence College this morning. He is a member of the Arts' Faculty there and director of the Sarah Lawrence Chorus which will broadcast a program over the Columbia Broadcasting System at 2:15 on April 10.

He admitted that he was somewhat fatigued after having commuted between Boston and New York for three days. Wednesday he was in Boston for a rehearsal, took the sleeper back to New York that night to attend the playing of "Prayer 1943" at Carnegie Hall Thursday night, went back to Boston Friday for the performance there Saturday, and returned to New York Saturday night. When he was asked what the Boston newspapers had to say about the premiere of his new work, Mr. Schuman replied, "I never read the papers."

'SPRING' MOOD [illegible] FOR SYMPHONY

[illegible]rks by Schumann, Ber[illegible]oz, Williams Played

[illegible]ARREN STOREY SMITH

[illegible]h of spring in the air gav[illegible]ateness to the performance a[illegible]'s Symphony Concert [illegible]n's "Spring" Symphony (hi[illegible] B-flat major) and to the re[illegible]dors of Berlioz' "Harold i[illegible]mphony, with which the pro[illegible]ncluded.

[illegible]sonal, or rather unseasons[illegible] the cathedral-like atmos[illegible] the first number. Vaugha[illegible]ntasia for string orchestr[illegible] by Thomas Tallis. Th[illegible]n "Harold" was Jean Le[illegible]violinist of the orchestra[illegible]' extraordinary work Dr[illegible] is making up for los[illegible]st April, when he revived[illegible]Bailly, who had come t[illegible]Concerto by Berezowsky[illegible] had gone unheard here[illegible] matters of orchestra[illegible]s not merely years but[illegible]of his time. His mu[illegible]s also prophetic. There[illegible] plasticity in his tonal[illegible]ar removed from the[illegible] of the classicists and[illegible]manticists. It is hard[illegible]vidence of the scores[illegible] Harold in Italy" was[illegible]nd Schumann's First

Since Dr. Koussevitzky revived the orchestral portions of the "Romeo and Juliet" "dramatic symphony" in October, this may be looked upon as a sort of Berlioz season. That the conductor has a flair for this music goes without saying. His frequent performances of the "Fantistique" alone would prove that fact.

To yesterday's superlative performance of "Harold in Italy" Mr. Lefranc contributed his portion. Regarding the work as a sort of concerto, the audience applauded after every movement.

There were three reasons for playing Vaughan Williams' Fantasia at this week's concerts. The composer turned 70 not long ago. Since the work was heard here last May there was no need for extensive preparation, and there is no composition that better shows off the Boston Symphony's remarkable strings.

There are other symphonies of Schumann besides the First and Fourth that are due for a hearing in these parts. But No. 1, with its bubbling enthusiasms, its warm lyricism, is always a grateful work for both players and hearers and Dr. Koussevitzky might almost be called its chosen interpreter.

MAIL POUCH

In Support of Harris

To the Music Editor:

A NENT Ferdinand Davis's comment on Roy Harris's Fifth symphony which you printed in last week's Hemidemisemiquavers, I should like to say that I believe that the quality of a work many times varies inversely with the critical panning which it elicits.

I heard this symphony and I thought it had many moments of genuine grandeur. To my mind a major work of an American composer can't get a square deal from America's omniscient critics.

RUTH BRECHER.

New York.

[58]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky changed the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week to include a memorial to Sergei Rachmaninoff. That composer's E minor Symphony replaced d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air in which Emma Boynet was to have been piano soloist. Miss Boynet appears, however, in the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat (K. 271). The other works are two Bach Preludes arranged for string orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," with Will Geer again as Speaker.

Other music by Rachmaninoff could have been chosen to honor his memory, but none would better have represented the Romantic attributes of his style than does the Second Symphony. Nor would any other have indicated more forcefully Rachmaninoff's consistent independence, for the Second Symphony was written in 1907, when creative music generally was following more turbulent currents.

The Second Symphony may now seem old-fashioned, which comparatively it is. The instrumental writing, with its heavy doublings, was not the best that Rachmaninoff achieved in his long career. What counts in this music is its passionate warmth, its rich, full-bodied tunes and charateristic Rachmaninoff harmony of somewhat Oriental chromatic tints. The style may have been passe even for 1907, but the substance is still fresh and vital.

It is not without significance that composers of music for Hollywood films have imitated this idiom many, many times. They know good tunes and harmony when they hear them.

Mozart's E-flat Piano Concerto, nicknamed the "Jeunehomme" Concerto after the French pianist for whom it was written, is truly a "young man" concerto. Mozart was 21 when the notes were put on paper, and every measure has the crisp energy of youth.

All the themes are of Mozart's usual salience. The final phrases for piano at the end of the andantino look ahead to the Romantic era and are not without similarity to that apocalyptic recitative which closes the slow movement of Beethoven's G major Piano Concerto.

Miss Boynet's performance was one of the best of a Mozart Concerto I have ever heard or hope to hear. It was pure, unflawed Mozart style, technically sparkling, cleanly articulated, all details neatly related to the whole, and with absolute perfection in the contrast of piano with orchestra. In view of such excellence, one felt regret that Miss Boynet could not also have been heard in d'Indy's lovely work. Let us hope for that next season.

Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced "A Lincoln Portrait" here two weeks ago. Another hearing did not alter one's first impression: that the most characterizing of the three sections is the last, and that because words of Lincoln are heard above Mr. Copland's music. The two preceding sections are good, but not indisputably associated with the character or the times of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Geer's part was more effective than it had been the first time; his voice retained the intended midwestern color, but his tones had more sonority, the lines were spoken more smoothly and with less deviation from the printed text.

Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangements of the two Bach Preludes—the first a slow Prelude for organ, the other the brilliant opening of the E major Partita for unaccompanied violin—are first-rate work.

The texture is solid but not thick; the contrapuntal voices move clearly and without too much fussy detail, and always the music remains close to the spirit and style of Bach. That is sound musicianship. Other Bach orchestrators please note.

Mr. Koussevitzy was in his element yesterday afternoon with Bach, Copland and Rachmaninoff, and his Mozart was exceptionally fine. As for the orchestra, it played magnificently from start to finish.

C. W. D.

LARCHMONT, N.Y
TIMES
4/1/43

SCHUMAN, LOCAL COMPOSER HEARS NUMBERS PLAYED

Boston Symphony Plays World Premiere Of His Work

The world premiere of one major orchestral composition by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the presentation three times in four days of another new work by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is a distinction which comes rarely, if a all, to an American composer. In fact, although there are no vital statistics on the subject, it is probably safe to say that it has never happened before. The young composer who enjoyed that unique distinction over the weekend is William Schuman of 17 Springdale Road, Woods of Larchmont.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance Saturday night of Mr. Schuman's new work: "A Free Song, Secular Contata No. 2 for Chorus and Orchestra." The orchestra was assisted by the choruses from Radcliffe College and Harvard University. The contata is adapted from poems by Walt Whitman, the first movement based on "Long, Too Long America" and "Look Down, Fair Moon" and the second movement adapted from "Song of the Banner At Daybreak."

The audience at Symphony Hall in Boston gave the work an enthusiastic reception and Mr. Schuman shared the honors from the stage with Mr. Koussevitsky.

It was a Schuman weekend at Carnegie Hall in New York, too. Thursday night Fritz Reiner conducted the Philharmonic in a presentation of "Prayer 1943", a composition with no set program but indicative of the prayerful mood in which the people of America and the United Nations look forward to victory.

The program was repeated Friday and again yesterday afternoon during the regular Sunday afternoon broadcast of the Philharmonic. Mr. Reiner conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony in the world premiere of "Prayer 1943" in Pittsburgh in February.

Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra will repeat "A Free Song" at Carnegie Hall in New York Saturday. The Radcliffe and Harvard choruses will accompany the orchestra to New York for the performance.

Mr. Schuman's reputation as a composer reached nation-wide proportions with the introduction of his Third and Foutrh Symphonies. (The Fourth was first played by the Philadelphia Orchestra last April with Eugene Ormandy conducting) but he was taking it all very calmly in his office at Sarah Lawrence College this morning. He is a member of the Arts' Faculty there and director of the Sarah Lawrence Chorus which will broadcast a program over the Columbia Broadcasting System at 2:15 on April 10.

He admitted that he was somewhat fatigued after having commuted between Boston and New York for three days. Wednesday he was in Boston for a rehearsal, took the sleeper back to New York that night to attend the playing of "Prayer 1943" at Carnegie Hall Thursday night, went back to Boston Friday for the performance there Saturday, and returned to New York Saturday night. When he was asked what the Boston newspapers had to say about the premiere of his new work, Mr. Schuman replied, "I never read the papers."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In Boston we are accustomed to ymphonic programs of two, three nd sometimes four works of sufficient length to make a full conert. The Boston Symphony Orhestra's program of this week, assembling six works from five comosers, is therefore pleasantly unsual, and all the more so because alf of it consists of unhackneyed horal music. Serge Koussevitzky onducted.

To start, there is Bach's cheerful hird Brandenburg Concerto, with e darksome Sinfonia from the antat "Christ Lay in Bonds of eath" inserted for slow movement. rahms is represented by the Variaons on a Theme by Haydn and "A ng of Destiny"; Strauss by the ne poem "Don Juan"; Hugo Wolf "The Fire-Rider," and Borodin the Polovetzian Dances from e opera "Prince Igor."

The purely instrumental pieces, nstituting the first half of the ternoon, were yesterday played th absolute magnificence. The ston Symphony strings never had re lustre and crispness than in e Brandenburg Concerto, and they re deliciously precise, as well. t only did Brahms' Variations and youthful tone poem of Strauss erge with clarily of detail, grace phrasing and symmetry of form, t the orchestral color—even in ahms—was superlatively rich. on Juan" is, furthermore, a work fire Mr. Koussevitzky's imagina-n, and his reading seemed ready break into flames at any mo-ent.

Brahms' modest choral score of e late 1860s had not been given by e Boston Symphony since the rahms Festival of 1930. It was erefore doubly welcome, for in dition to its relative unfamiliarity is music of solid worth. Even if e poem of Hoelderlin does not ove you very much, the music hich it inspired is expressive and nforced, and it "sounds."

Here the choruses of the Cecilia ociety and Apollo Club, trained by thur Fiedler, were at their best, nging with fine, round tone and cellent rhythm. In the considerly more difficult. "The Fire Rider" d Polovetzian Dances the chorus d not fare so well, although the et music of Wolf went off better an the shrill and faded score of rodin. Yet in all three works, eir enunciation was far from unrstandable.

Considering the dramatic effect of The Fire Rider" in the choral-orestral version, it seems impossible at Wolf's original conception, for lo voice and piano, could work up ywhere near so much excitement. et one can sense that an exceponally gifted singer, dramatically, uld make a good deal of the text. This listener thanks Mr. Koussetzky for an opportunity to hear ese short choral pieces. It seems l too true that American concertrs have come to think of choruses terms of big scores, which is a y. There are many works in hall forms for chorus that deserve be heard now and again.

Next week is Holy Week, and erefore the Boston Symphony's ternoon concert will be given on ursday. The evening concert will usual take place on Saturday.—

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILTON, PA.
EVENING STANDARD

Esplanade Concerts By Boston Symphony Orchestra Canceled

Boston—(U.P.)—The Esplanade concerts by the Boston Syhpmony Orchestra will be canceled this year and next because of possible air raids, Chairman Eugene C. Hultman of the Metropolitan District Commission said today.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
APR 1 - 1943

Noted Conductor To Appear at Rutgers

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

These words are the deep conviction of Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear at Rutgers University this Sunday in the Rutgers gymnasium at 3 o'clock. A capacity crowd, including music lovers from the Trenton area, is expected to hear the musical organization of 110 pieces.

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes life full is the experience of tragedy in some form and rising to its challenges," Dr. Koussevitzky exclaims. "The great composers have all had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world."

A bond of profound sympathy exists between the genius and humanity in great music, says the noted conductor. "The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes and printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

Sunday's concert will be the seventh consecutive appearance of the Boston Symphony at Rutgers. Tickets may be secured at the Music House, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, and will also be on sale the day of the concert.

VARIED STYLES BY SYMPHONY

Three Numbers With Orchestra, 3 With Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Taking the word in its calendar sense, one might term this week's Symphony programme a spring miscellany. Moreover, a similar six-number assortment awaits us on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening next.

The list now under consideration, however, may be conveniently divided into three pieces for orchestra alone, before the intermission, and three with chorus after it. The singers have been provided by the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club, as trained by Arthur Fiedler.

The climax of the first half of the concert came yesterday in a superbly realized presentation of Strauss' "Don Juan," early Strauss to be sure, but still incandescent when the right conductor and orchestra turn their attention to it. Dr. Koussevitzky led up to this climax gradually by way of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, for strings, with the interpolated Sinfonia from the Cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," and Brahms' Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Brahms is orchestrally richer than Bach, but Strauss in this respect put them both in the shade. It was almost as though fresh air and strong light have been admitted into a close and cobwebbed chamber.

As it happened, nothing that came afterwards could match this "Don Juan" for effectiveness though there might have been a different tale to tell if Dr. Koussevitzky had had a chorus to match his orchestra. As it was, he seemed most of the time to be pulling a dead weight. In detail, these choral numbers were Brahms' "Song of Destiny," last heard at Symphony Hall in 1930; Wolf's choral yersion of his song, "The Fire Rider," heard here with orchestra only once before, in 1927; and the "Polovetzian" Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," last given at these concerts nine years ago.

The strongest parts of "The Song of Destiny" are the serenely beautiful orchestral introduction and postlude. Somehow, when the chorus enters a certain spell seems to be broken to be renewed only when the voices cease their singing. With all due respect to the genius of Wolf, a song writer second only to Schubert when his total output is considered, "The Fire Rider" is a footless piece. The "Prince Igor" Dances are, of course, one of the brightest pages in the annals of Russian music but our bleak New England spring seemed to have laid its hold on yesterday's would-be Tartars and chilled both their sensuous musings and their frenzied clamors.

HAIL PENSION FUND CONCERT

Enthusiastic Audience at Symphony Hall

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Encouraged by the public response to its performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at a pension fund concert last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra repeated that work yesterday afternoon and for the same worthy cause. Again the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisted in the finale. Again a crowded house was stormily applausive at the end. Last year, Dr. Koussevitzky preceded the Ninth with a Bach Magnificat; yesterday, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture was the curtain-raiser.

So far as the three instrumental movements are concerned, we have come to take for granted the inspired performances of the Ninth that we receive from Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. With the chorus there is the same old problem of sonority. Youthful voices simply do not have the body and impact of those of more mature singers and yet, all things considered, these spring concerts with the Harvard and Radcliffe forces are the most satisfactory choral concerts to be heard in Boston today. Thanks to Mr. Woodworth, the singers are always excellently trained. They sing with understanding and above all, with enthusiasm.

Solo singers the Ninth Symphony must have and yet their portion is not a very rewarding one. The quartet yesterday was composed of Zina Lisichkina, Anna Kaskas, Kurt Baum and Julius Huehn. On the last-named fell the heaviest burden and he bore it well. Mr. Baum's voice is pleasing but a bit light for his long solo in that incongruously martial episode. The women singers sufficed.

To return to the beginning, the performance of the "Leonore" Overture was no less persuasive than that of the symphony. If only Dr. Koussevitzky would not adopt that un-Beethovenish double pianissimo at the beginning of the allegro and the same goes for the initial announcement by basses and 'cellos of the chief theme of the symphony's finale. In both cases there is the effect of extending the dynamic range of the crescendo but in neither instance is the conductor's procedure dramatically justified.

[59]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky changed the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week to include a memorial to Sergei Rachmaninoff. That composer's E minor Symphony replaced d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air in which Emma Boynet was to have been piano soloist. Miss Boynet appears, however, in the Mozart Piano Concerto in E flat (K. 271). The other works are two Bach Preludes arranged for string orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," with Will Geer again as Speaker.

Other music by Rachmaninoff could have been chosen to honor his memory, but none would better have represented the Romantic attributes of his style than does the Second Symphony. Nor would any other have indicated more forcefully Rachmaninoff's consistent independence, for the Second Symphony was written in 1907, when creative music generally was following more turbulent currents.

The Second Symphony may now seem old-fashioned, which comparatively it is. The instrumental writing, with its heavy doublings, was not the best that Rachmaninoff achieved in his long career. What counts in this music is its passionate warmth, its rich, full-bodied tunes and charateristic Rachmaninoff harmony of somewhat Oriental chromatic tints. The style may have been passe even for 1907, but the substance is still fresh and vital.

It is not without significance that composers of music for Hollywood films have imitated this idiom many, many times. They know good tunes and harmony when they hear them.

Mozart's E-flat Piano Concerto, nicknamed the "Jeunehomme" Concerto after the French pianist for whom it was written, is truly a "young man" concerto. Mozart was 21 when the notes were put on paper, and every measure has the crisp energy of youth.

All the themes are of Mozart's usual salience. The final phrases for piano at the end of the andantino look ahead to the Romantic era and are not without similarity to that apocalyptic recitative which closes the slow movement of Beethoven's G major Piano Concerto.

Miss Boynet's performance was one of the best of a Mozart Concerto I have ever heard or hope to hear. It was pure, unflawed Mozart style, technically sparkling, cleanly articulated, all details neatly related to the whole, and with absolute perfection in the contrast of piano with orchestra. In view of such excellence, one felt regret that Miss Boynet could not also have been heard in d'Indy's lovely work. Let us hope for that next season.

Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced "A Lincoln Portrait" here two weeks ago. Another hearing did not alter one's first impression: that the most characterizing of the three sections is the last, and that because words of Lincoln are heard above Mr. Copland's music. The two preceding sections are good, but not indisputably associated with the character or the times of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Geer's part was more effective than it had been the first time; his voice retained the intended midwestern color, but his tones had more sonority, the lines were spoken more smoothly and with less deviation from the printed text.

Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangements of the two Bach Preludes—the first a slow Prelude for organ, the other the brilliant opening of the E major Partita for unaccompanied violin—are first-rate work.

The texture is solid but not thick; the contrapuntal voices move clearly and without too much fussy detail, and always the music remains close to the spirit and style of Bach. That is sound musicianship. Other Bach orchestrators please note.

Mr. Koussevitzy was in his element yesterday afternoon with Bach, Copland and Rachmaninoff, and his Mozart was exceptionally fine. As for the orchestra, it played magnificently from start to finish.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
APR 1 - 1943

Noted Conductor To Appear at Rutgers

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

These words are the deep conviction of Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear at Rutgers University this Sunday in the Rutgers gymnasium at 3 o'clock. A capacity crowd, including music lovers from the Trenton area, is expected to hear the musical organization of 110 pieces.

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes life full is the experience of tragedy in some form and rising to its challenges," Dr. Koussevitzky exclaims. "The great composers have all had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world."

A bond of profound sympathy exists between the genius and humanity in great music, says the noted conductor. "The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes and printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

Sunday's concert will be the seventh consecutive appearance of the Boston Symphony at Rutgers. Tickets may be secured at the Music House, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, and will also be on sale the day of the concert.

LARCHMONT, N.Y
TIMES
4/1/43

SCHUMAN, LOC... COMPOSER HEA... NUMBERS PLAY...

Boston Symphony World Premiere ... Work

The world premiere of ... jor orchestral composition ... Boston Symphony orches... the presentation three time... days of another new worl... New York Philharmonic-S... Society is a distinction whi... rarely, if a all, to an A... composer. In fact, althou... are no vital statistics on ... ject, it is probably safe to ... it has never happened bef... young composer who enjo... unique distinction over t... end is William Schuma... Springdale Road, Woods ... mont.

Serge Koussevitsky and ... ton Symphony Orchestra ... first performance Saturd... of Mr. Schuman's new w... Free Song, Secular Contat... for Chorus and Orchestra ... orchestra was assisted by t... uses from Radcliffe Coll... Harvard University. The ... is adapted from poems ... Whitman, the first movemen... on "Long, Too Long Ameri... "Look Down, Fair Moon" ... second movement adapte... "Song of the Banner At Day...

The audience at Symphon... in Boston gave the work an... iastic reception and Mr. S... shared the honors from th... with Mr. Koussevitsky.

It was a Schuman week ... Carnegie Hall in New Yo... Thursday night Fritz Rein... ducted the Philharmonic i... sentation of "Prayer 1943"... position with no set pro... indicative of the praye... in which the people of A... the United Nations l... to victory.

The program was rep... day and again yeste... during the regula... noon broadcast of ... ic. Mr. Reiner condu... burgh Symphony ... premiere of "Prayer ... burgh in February.

Mr. Koussevitsky a... ton orchestra will repe... Song" at Carnegie Ha... York Saturday. The Ra... Harvard choruses will a... the orchestra to New Yor... performance.

Mr. Schuman's reputati... composer reached nation-wi... portions with the introduct... his Third and Foutrh Symph... (The Fourth was first playe... the Philadelphia Orchestra last ... ril with Eugene Ormandy cond... ing) but he was taking it all ... calmly in his office at Sarah Law... rence College this morning. He i... a member of the Arts' Faculty ... there and director of the Sarah ... Lawrence Chorus which will ... broadcast a program over the Co... lumbia Broadcasting System at ... 2:15 on April 10.

He admitted that he was some... what fatigued after having com... muted between Boston and New ... York for three days. Wednesday ... he was in Boston for a rehearsal, ... took the sleeper back to New York ... that night to attend the playing ... of "Prayer 1943" at Carnegie Hall ... Thursday night, went back to Bos... ton Friday for the performance ... there Saturday, and returned to ... New York Saturday night. When ... he was asked what the Boston ... newspapers had to say about the ... premiere of his new work, Mr. ... Schuman replied, "I never read ... the papers."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In Boston we are accustomed to symphonic programs of two, three and sometimes four works of sufficient length to make a full concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program of this week, assembling six works from five composers, is therefore pleasantly unusual, and all the more so because half of it consists of unhackneyed choral music. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

To start, there is Bach's cheerful Third Brandenburg Concerto, with the darksome Sinfonia from the Cantat "Christ Lay in Bonds of Death" inserted for slow movement. Brahms is represented by the Variations on a Theme by Haydn and "A Song of Destiny"; Strauss by the tone poem "Don Juan"; Hugo Wolf by "The Fire-Rider," and Borodin by the Polovetzian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor."

The purely instrumental pieces, constituting the first half of the afternoon, were yesterday played with absolute magnificence. The Boston Symphony strings never had more lustre and crispness than in the Brandenburg Concerto, and they were deliciously precise, as well. Not only did Brahms' Variations and the youthful tone poem of Strauss emerge with clarily of detail, grace of phrasing and symmetry of form, but the orchestral color—even in Brahms—was superlatively rich. "Don Juan" is, furthermore, a work to fire Mr. Koussevitzky's imagination, and his reading seemed ready to break into flames at any moment.

Brahms' modest choral score of the late 1860s had not been given by the Boston Symphony since the Brahms Festival of 1930. It was therefore doubly welcome, for in addition to its relative unfamiliarity it is music of solid worth. Even if the poem of Hoelderlin does not move you very much, the music which it inspired is expressive and unforced, and it "sounds."

Here the choruses of the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club, trained by Arthur Fiedler, were at their best, singing with fine, round tone and excellent rhythm. In the considerably more difficult. "The Fire Rider" and Polovetzian Dances the chorus did not fare so well, although the fleet music of Wolf went off better than the shrill and faded score of Borodin. Yet in all three works, their enunciation was far from understandable.

Considering the dramatic effect of "The Fire Rider" in the choral-orchestral version, it seems impossible that Wolf's original conception, for solo voice and piano, could work up anywhere near so much excitement. Yet one can sense that an exceptionally gifted singer, dramatically, could make a good deal of the text.

This listener thanks Mr. Koussevitzky for an opportunity to hear these short choral pieces. It seems all too true that American concertgoers have come to think of choruses in terms of big scores, which is a pity. There are many works in small forms for chorus that deserve to be heard now and again.

Next week is Holy Week, and therefore the Boston Symphony's afternoon concert will be given on Thursday. The evening concert will as usual take place on Saturday.—

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILTON, PA.
EVENING STANDARD

Esplanade Concerts By Boston Symphony Orchestra Canceled

Boston—(U.P.)—The Esplanade concerts by the Boston Syhpmony Orchestra will be canceled this year and next because of possible air raids, Chairman Eugene C. Hultman of the Metropolitan District Commission said today.

VARIED STYLES BY SYMPHONY

Three Numbers With Orchestra, 3 With Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Taking the word in its calendar sense, one might term this week's Symphony programme a spring miscellany. Moreover, a similar six-number assortment awaits us on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening next.

The list now under consideration, however, may be conveniently divided into three pieces for orchestra alone, before the intermission, and three with chorus after it. The singers have been provided by the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club, as trained by Arthur Fiedler.

The climax of the first half of the concert came yesterday in a superbly realized presentation of Strauss' "Don Juan," early Strauss to be sure, but still incandescent when the right conductor and orchestra turn their attention to it. Dr. Koussevitzky led up to this climax gradually by way of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, for strings, with the interpolated Sinfonia from the Cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," and Brahms' Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Brahms is orchestrally richer than Bach, but Strauss in this respect put them both in the shade. It was almost as though fresh air and strong light have been admitted into a close and cobwebbed chamber.

As it happened, nothing that came afterwards could match this "Don Juan" for effectiveness though there might have been a different tale to tell if Dr. Koussevitzky had had a chorus to match his orchestra. As it was, he seemed most of the time to be pulling a dead weight. In detail, these choral numbers were Brahms' "Song of Destiny," last heard at Symphony Hall in 1930; Wolf's choral yersion of his song, "The Fire Rider," heard here with orchestra only once before, in 1927; and the "Polovetzian" Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," last given at these concerts nine years ago.

The strongest parts of "The Song of Destiny" are the serenely beautiful orchestral introduction and postlude. Somehow, when the chorus enters a certain spell seems to be broken to be renewed only when the voices cease their singing. With all due respect to the genius of Wolf, a song writer second only to Schubert when his total output is considered, "The Fire Rider" is a footless piece. The "Prince Igor" Dances are, of course, one of the brightest pages in the annals of Russian music but our bleak New England spring seemed to have laid its hold on yesterday's would-be Tartars and chilled both their sensuous musings and their frenzied clamors.

HAIL PENSION FUND CONCERT

Enthusiastic Audience at Symphony Hall

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Encouraged by the public response to its performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at a pension fund concert last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra repeated that work yesterday afternoon and for the same worthy cause. Again the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assisted in the finale. Again a crowded house was stormily applausive at the end. Last year, Dr. Koussevitzky preceded the Ninth with a Bach Magnificat; yesterday, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture was the curtain-raiser.

So far as the three instrumental movements are concerned, we have come to take for granted the inspired performances of the Ninth that we receive from Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. With the chorus there is the same old problem of sonority. Youthful voices simply do not have the body and impact of those of more mature singers and yet, all things considered, these spring concerts with the Harvard and Radcliffe forces are the most satisfactory choral concerts to be heard in Boston today. Thanks to Mr. Woodworth, the singers are always excellently trained. They sing with understanding and above all, with enthusiasm.

Solo singers the Ninth Symphony must have and yet their portion is not a very rewarding one. The quartet yesterday was composed of Zina Lisichkina, Anna Kaskas, Kurt Baum and Julius Huehn. On the last-named fell the heaviest burden and he bore it well. Mr. Baum's voice is pleasing but a bit light for his long solo in that incongruously martial episode. The women singers sufficed.

To return to the beginning, the performance of the "Leonore" Overture was no less persuasive than that of the symphony. If only Dr. Koussevitzky would not adopt that un-Beethovenish double pianissimo at the beginning of the allegro and the same goes for the initial announcement by basses and 'cellos of the chief theme of the symphony's finale. In both cases there is the effect of extending the dynamic range of the crescendo but in neither instance is the conductor's procedure dramatically justified.

[59]

BUDGET IS TARGET FOR MANY GROUPS

Realty Men Call 15-Point Rise in Tax Rate Illegal and Threaten Court Action

HIGHER RENTS PREDICTED

Early Date for Hearing by the Estimate Board Assailed—Teachers in Protest

Mayor La Guardia's executive budget of $753,071,123 for 1943-44, balanced by assuming an all-time high tax rate of at least $2.94 for each $100 of assessed valuation, was the target yesterday of vigorous criticism from real estate and business groups as well as teachers' organizations.

The realty interests declared that any deficit in city funds for the year should be met through more stringent economies rather than by a fifteen-point jump in taxes on already over-assessed real estate. Charles F. Noyes, chairman of the board of the Charles F. Noyes Company, Inc., realty men, advanced a suggestion that a tax strike was not beyond the bounds of possibility if the Mayor's budget was adopted.

There was every indication that the public hearings by the Board of Estimate next Thursday and Friday would be stormy sessions. The Citizens Budget Commission protested against the hearing dates, suggesting that they should be changed to April 14 and 15 to provide more opportunity to study and analyze the budget provisions.

Quill Gives His Approval

About the only favorable reaction to the Mayor's budget came from the Transport Workers Union, C. I. O., whose international president, Michael J. Quill, expressed satisfaction with the announced intention of the Board of Transportation to allocate $3,000,000 for wage rises for city transit system employes now earning up to $2,500 a year. The Mayor set aside $8,000,000 for pay rises for about 51,000 city employes, exclusive of transit workers, earning up to $2,500 annually. The transit pay rises, actually, have nothing to do with the Mayor's budget, as they will be met from the revenues of the unified transit lines.

The "almost unbelievable" boost in the tax rate, Mr. Noyes declared, may be a blessing in disguise if it arouses real estate owners to the fact that they are already paying taxes on illegal assessments, violative of the constitutional ban against assessing property for more than its value. Mr. Noyes, however, extended an olive branch in the form of an appeal to real estate interests and home owners to "stop calling names and cooperate with Mayor La Guardia, Newbold Morris and Controller Joseph D. McGoldrick in asking for a special session of the State Legislature so as not only to permit New York City freedom in handling its finances and taxation problems but also definitely to reduce the assessments to a proper and legal level."

Early Hearing Assailed

Walter Hoving, chairman of the Committee to Balance the Budget Through Sensible Economies, who joined with the Citizens Budget Commission in protesting that more time for studying the budget should be allowed before the public hearings by the Board of Estimate, charged that Mayor La Guardia was "deliberately and pre-

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 2- 1943

'LINCOLN PORTRAIT' IS PRESENTED HERE

Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra Offer Copland Work at Carnegie Hall

HANDEL CONCERTO HEARD

Rachmaninoff 'Isle of Dead' Is Played—Shostakovich's Fifth Ends Program

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

When Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to New York they bring gifts of exciting programs, spiced more often than not with new works. At Carnegie Hall last night they introduced to New York, Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," and a hasty judgment based on one hearing might hazard the guess that this is the American composer's best score.

Mr. Copland wrote it at the suggestion of André Kostelanetz, who directed the Cincinnati Orchestra in its première last May. The composer knew, of course, that the figure of Lincoln is elusive for any portraitist, particularly for one who deals in tones. Only a Carl Sandburg, with a handful of volumes, can do complete justice by the man. But Mr. Copland did not aim at completeness.

Made a Quick Sketch

He sought, in his own words, "to suggest something of the mysterious sense of fatality that surrounds Lincoln's personality," to convey "something of his gentleness and simplicity of spirit," to make a quick sketch of the turbulent times, and finally, to "draw a simple but impressive frame about the words of Lincoln himself."

Mr. Copland has produced a warm, earthy, sensitive, evocative score. He employs two familiar tunes — "Camptown Races" and "Springfield Mountain." He does not labor them literally, but weaves them cunningly into the texture of his work. The portrait is unpretentious and honest, like the sitter; it is not weighed down with frozen reverence.

For the final part of the score Mr. Copland has prepared a brief text, drawn largely from Lincoln's magnificent words. Will Geer of Broadway spoke it with the nasal drawl that a Midwesterner might have used. Though the words are noble and timely for our day, they are not fused with complete success. Mr. Copland employs background effects for the speaker, and some of these sound like poor movie music. It might have been better to leave the spoken words without accompaniment.

Tribute to a Friend

The program began with a meticulously realized performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10. Mr. Koussevitzky then directed Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," in tribute to the composer who died last Sunday. It was an impressive tribute, for this is one of Rachmaninoff's finest scores. Mr. Koussevitzky poured into it what he felt at the loss of a lifelong friend.

The brilliant concert ended with Shostakovich's Fifth symphony, which had a stunning performance. The audience seemed to enjoy it overwhelmingly, and one cannot but agree with it. Possibly the symphony is not for the ages. Can any one living today be sure of what is for the ages? Shostakovich's Fifth remains a work that contemporary audiences enjoy, and that is accomplishment enough for any composer.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
APR 2- 1943

BOSTONIANS PLAY 'LINCOLN PORTRAIT'

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

For the second time in as many nights, the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff has been honored in Carnegie Hall by one of America's leading orchestras. Last night it was the Boston Symphony, devotedly led by Serge Koussevitzky, that played its melancholy tribute. This time the music that was set resounding for an elegiac purpose was Rachmaninoff's own—"The Isle of the Dead," which he composed at the age of 34 while living in Dresden. That was in 1907.

The scattering of applause that came from many parts of the house was unfortunate and clearly against the desires of the conductor, who left the platform without acknowledging it. Aside from its commemorative fitness in this program, "The Isle of the Dead" is too worthy a work to be neglected as it has been in New York in recent years. Once fairly familiar on our programs, it has become almost a stranger to our audiences. Granted such eloquent playing as was its lot on this occasion, it ought to retain a hold on many listeners.

Last night's concert possessed a novelty in Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which came to being as one of three such pictures composed early in 1942 at the suggestion of Andre Kostelanetz and accorded their first performances by him at a Pension Fund concert of the Cincinnati Symphony last May. The others were "Portraits" of Mark Twain and Mayor LaGuardia by Jerome Kern and Virgil Thomson, respectively. Mr. Copland's scheme requires the participation of a speaker, who in the final part of his composition declaims five relatively short quotations from the Civil War President, along with connecting lines mostly of the order of "This is what Abe Lincoln said."

Will Geer, an actor well known to Broadway, fulfilled this task. Whether his "Tobacco Road" voice was the right one with which to project the maxims of the Great Emancipator is at the moment of less concern than Mr. Copland's music. Though the composer has stated that his sole object in this concluding section was "to draw a simple but impressive frame about the words of Lincoln himself," it is to be feared that he has handicapped rather than furthered the expressiveness of his score.

The same quotations can be better understood when read in program notes. The music becomes "background" for the talking and almost entirely loses its own thrust. The earlier portions, in which the orchestra has no such competition, have a neat if in no sense a weighty suggestiveness. The close, employing an attractive, even a rather catchy melodic phrase, again asserts a valid if lightweight musical appeal. Aside from the title and the quotations, there may be little reason to think of Lincoln, but the score is one that would merit attention without its overweening programmatic associations. It would be a still better score, this reviewer is convinced, if the spoken lines were stricken entirely and the music of this particular section revised to enable it to stand alone.

Mr. Koussevitzky assured the "Portrait" a clear and pointed introduction. He also lavished upon Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor all the glamour of his strings and heaped prodigies of virtuosity on the enormously busy Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch. A capacity audience demonstrated that none of this generosity has gone astray.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 2- 1943

Lincoln Speaks For Himself

By Henry Simon

Of all the composers who have attempted to treat Abraham Lincoln musically (Goldmark, Weinberger, Mason, Gould, et al.) Aaron Copland easily has been the smartest. He let Lincoln speak for himself.

Thursday night Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played the score of Mr. Copland's A Lincoln Portrait for the first time in New York, though both Mr. Koussevitzky and Andre Kostelanetz, who commissioned the score, had conducted it earlier in other cities. Will Geer spoke passages from various Lincoln letters and speeches, ending, of course, with the close of the Gettysburg Address. As Mr. Copland foresaw, the well-chosen and well-spoken words were more eloquent than any music he could hope to write. He therefore contented himself with a brief introduction, using Springfield Mountain and The Camptown Races as his principal themes and carrying them over into the background music for the words.

It is all done in Mr. Copland's best movie-score style; and as he is writing just about the finest movie music in America today, it was first-rate. It's no mean achievement to write music to match such pregnant words as Lincoln's, even if it is only background music. The score is as lean as Lincoln himself, earthy and sincere, and much the most satisfactory music on that subject we have had to date.

In memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff, the orchestra played his eloquent Island of the Dead beautifully. The concert started with a Handel Concerto Grosso and ended with a rousing performance of the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 2- 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Introduces Copland Score; Ballet Theatre Starts Off in Top Form

Koussevitzky paid the finest tribute to Rachmaninoff at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night when he rearranged his program to give one of the pianist-composer's own works. By playing the symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead," he reminded the audience that the memory of Rachmaninoff lives on in his works; that his immortality is already with us. It was a beautiful tribute, for the work was played with deep understanding.

The news of the evening was the first performance in New York of Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The work was composed at the suggestion of Andre Kostelanetz. It is in three sections, wherein the first suggests the personality, the second the times in which he lived, the third a background for the words of Lincoln himself. That Copland has achieved his purpose was strikingly evident. There is originality and identity in the score, while the use of the spoken word was an inspiration not only to the composer but for the audience.

Copland's own idiom of expression, so well known after "Billy the Kid," finds a natural atmosphere. His rhythmic angle gives stature to the characterization. He has something to convey, and does it. If the speaking of the words was dramatic, that is as it should be. To be carried away by them was not to overlook the musical preparation for them or the appropriate handling of that section of the work. Will Geer spoke the lines most effectively.

The concert opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Opus 6, No. 10 and closed with the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony.

Ballet Theatre Opens Spring Season at Met

Sure-fire is the word for Ballet Theatre these days. It opened strong for its Spring season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, though its program offered standard fare to its most ardent followers on an opening night, "Swan Lake," with Alicia Markova and Andre Englevsky. "Pillar of Fire," with Nora Kaye, Lucia Chase, Antony Tudor and Hugh Laing; "Bluebeard," with Anton Dolin and Karen Conrad: this was all quite familiar and quite good in that part of the performance it was possible to see.

Constant repetition of "Pillar of Fire" serves to emphasize the weakness of matching this story and choreography to the Schonberg music as well as that of the ending. "Bluebeard" has that essential vitality and spark of humor that thrive on repetition both of the work itself and the dancers' execution of it. The conductor of the evening, Antal Dorati, appeared to have matters well in hand.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 2- 1943

BECKETT CONDUCTS CONCERT FOR PUPILS

2,000 Hear First in Series of Educational Offerings

Wheeler Beckett, conductor of the Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led seventy members of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the Hunter College Auditorium in the first of a series of three educational concerts for high school students of this city. The initial event in the series, sponsored by the William T. Morris Foundation, attracted an enthusiastic audience of 2,000 children, most of them from the music classes of the city's high schools.

After an address of welcome by George H. Gartlan, director of music in the New York City public schools, Mr. Beckett directed a program composed of the Brahms Second symphony, Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela" and the overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Beckett prefaced his reading of each of these works with brief but exceedingly informative explanatory remarks illustrated by the orchestra. He conducted with a firm, incisive beat, evoking an orchestral tone that was invariably mellow, well-blended, pure and of marked singing quality.

The orchestra, with Mishel Piastro as concertmaster, played excellently throughout the afternoon, giving of their best and responding most sensitively to every slightest indication made by the conductor.

N. S.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
APR 2 - 1943

Music by Renowned Composers On Program of Koussevitzky

Music by four renowned composers written in their prime of life will be on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play Sunday at 3 p. m. in Rutgers University gymnasium.

Mozart will be represented with his Symphony in C Major (K. 338), one of about half a hundred symphonies he composed and deemed a fine example of his work in the field. The composer, who lived only to 35 years, produced this symphony in his early 20's. Always composing with a spontaneous perfection, he was continually at the height of his genius.

The selection which the audience will probably await with the most interest will be Beethoven's familiar Fifth Symphony in C minor. Beethoven, who was constantly in the toils of an emotional problem, a financial crisis or physical disabilities, had a dozen or so fairly happy years in the middle of his life. During this period, when he had long since found himself in terms of musical expression, although he had not reached the prodigious heights of his last years, he composed the Fifth Symphony.

Maurice Ravel, the late French composer, was 35 when he wrote the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet in 1910. The ballet, produced by the famous Diaghileff in 1912, was immediately acclaimed. The music was later arranged in two orchestra suites, of which the second, a marvel of orchestration and a marvel of tone as produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the program Sunday.

The fourth composition, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," was also at one time produced as a ballet by Nijinsky for Diaghileff, although this creation met little favor with the composer, Claude Debussy.

Debussy began this composition in 1892 at the age of 30, inspired by a poem by Stephane Mallarme of the symbolist school. Originally he had intended the work to have three sections, but only the prelude materialized. It was first performed late in 1894 on a program with works of Glazounov, Saint-Saens, Cesar Franck and some lesser composers; but the Debussy composition, although pronounced "interesting," produced no great stir. Now, typical of his subtle style, his shifting musical light and shadow, and elusive harmonies, the work has long been a favorite with audiences everywhere.

Tickets are on sale at the Rutgers Music House, College avenue, and will be available at the gymnasium before the performance Sunday.—M. P.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 3 - 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Plays Two American Works In Final Boston Program at the Academy

What with two American works and Beethoven's "Victory" Symphony, Koussevitzky's final program with the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music last night could have had a patriotic motive. There was plenty of cause for it aside from the Beethoven, for both American works were duly appreciated, while the applause of the evening went to Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which had had its first New York performance the previous evening in Carnegie Hall.

That Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland has written one of his most interesting and most compelling works was made more apparent on a second hearing. His stamp is on this work with all its "hollow" intervals, its trumpets and its economy of statement, but there is a fuller scoring that makes the work more substantial without taking anything away froom its originality. This music expresses purpose, it has meaning, and it builds up to a moving dramatic climax.

It will be argued that the spoken words, given so characteristically and so understandingly by Will Geer, may detract from the score, that music without words could have done as well or better. With other music, that might have been so, but to this listener the words are an integral part of the conception of the work as a whole and a logical outcome of the way in which Copland has worked through his score. Profounder music could have relied on its own eloquence, but this is a modern portrait, not necessarily one of the great masterpieces of all time. Copland has grasped the significance of his subject and drawn his portrait in accordance with the materials with which he works. Those words of Lincoln are immortal words; they have their own eloquence. Copland no doubt recognized that fact; he has not robbed them of effect, he has thrown them into greater relief by means of his musical plan.

The other American work was Samuel Barber's "Essy for Orchestra," a skillfully conceived and neatly executed work which says something in its own way, too. It sounds well and it is well sustained though, strangely enough, it left an impression of being just a bit old-fashioned. Like that of the Copland work, the performance was one of comprehension and of conviction on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

BARBARA CUSTANCE, Canadian pianist, will give her first Town Hall recital Monday evening, 8:30 o'clock.

This program opened with the Handel Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Opus 6, No. 10. It is a charming work. All the perfection of its style was completely realized in the performance, one in which delicacy and refinement marked the acme of playing for this orchestra. They had played it the evening before, but this performance was a finer one.

There was a subdued air about Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Beethoven. It expressed a thoughtful restraint from heroics. If anything, the symphony was too nicely played. One would question the broad tempo of the third movement and wonder at the sharpness of the dramatic contrasts which left a less unified impression of the work as a whole.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 4 - 1943

SCHUMAN SONG LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Premiere Here of His Secular Cantata No. 2 Given at Final Carnegie Hall Concert

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who, in a recent New York season of Boston Symphony concerts devoted his first two programs to American music, has made his last two concerts in this city of the series of 1942-43 principally of the works of native songs. Three of these figured in the final program of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They were William Schuman with his secular cantata, "A Free Song" after Whitman, for mixed chorus and orchestra, played for the first time in this city; Samuel Barber, whose "Essay for Orchestra, No. 1," followed, and Aaron Copland. His "Lincoln Portrait," for diseur and orchestra, was repeated following its New York première of Thursday. The second half was a tactful reversion to classicism, in the instance of Beethoven's immortally dramatic Fifth Symphony.

Written in Choral Way

Sometimes Mr. Schuman writes in a choral way for chorus and sometimes, with voices as well as orchestra, he devotes himself to the instrumental style. The first of his settings of Whitman verses which form his text is written in the former way, and at an initial hearing this is the best part of the cantata. The score contains much dexterous writing, but some that does not fall upon the ear as a spontaneous and unforced musical speech. This, of course, may not be so. A musical terminology which is unfamiliar can become with usage the accepted and conventional idiom of a later day. These things have happened.

Privately we don't think they are yet happening with Mr. Schuman. We think he has yet to find himself and his native style as a composer. In the meantime his experiments are usually provocative and suggestive of leads struck out which may conduct the author to very desirable places. The opening lines of "Long, Too Long, America" sound a summons and a challenge that goes straight over the footlights. The progress of this first part of the cantata is fundamentally dramatic and has much that is suggestive in the writing for orchestra as well as voices. Part two comes through well at the end, with ahe apostrophe to liberty. There are sandier stretches between, where the use of the fugue formula does not recompense for the absence of a commanding utterance.

Barber's Work Discussed

Mr. Barber's is excellent writing, not earth-shaking, or in any way prophetic of revolution, but in its form and logic of treatment, and refreshing sense of direction, of the composer knowing exactly what he wants to do, and skilfully doing it, is good work, music that has both contour and mood. Mr. Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" was first heard here the preceding Thursday evening and at the time received critical discussion in these columns. His methods are interesting. He has given us an instrumental background for texts taken from certain speeches of Lincoln, and in a score conspicuous for brevity has based two parts of it on American folk-tunes. Thus he shows, as he also shows in his best ballet music of recent vintage, the value of native folk-melody as material for manipulation by the modern composer.

The question, of course, is then the manner of manipulation. The audience gave all three of these compositions a cordial reception. Messrs. Schuman and Barber, the latter in army uniform, with Mr. Will Geer, the reciter of the occasion, Lincolnian in stature and designedly nasal of speech in traditional manner, were repeatedly called back to the stage. Most of the music of this first half of the program was essentially dramatic in thought. Also called to the stage was G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, which organizations had taken part in its performance of Mr. Schuman's music.

There was no doubt a dramatic symbolism as musical balance implied in the conclusion with Beethoven's incomparable Symphony of Liberty. The eerie premonitions of the schezo and the wildly victorious finale brought conductor and orchestra salvos of applause.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 2 - 1943

Bostonians in Tribute to Lincoln

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Will Geer, Broadway actor, acting as narrator-spokesman for Abe Lincoln, the Boston Symphony Orchestra unveiled Aaron Copland's A. Lincoln Portrait to rousing applause in Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Standing at Mr. Koussevitzky's left, Mr. Geer read timely truths on freedom and democracy from the Great Commoner's speeches, ending with the last words of the Gettysburg address.

The score is one of Mr. Copland's best to date, if not the best. Freely woven into the fabric are fragments of tunes like Camptown Races and Springfield Mountain.

While all listeners will differ on any music's programmatic content, the Copland score does evoke an heroic mood, against which rises the image of a lone and simple man battling inhumanity.

Topped by the Gettysburg excerpt, the combination of exalted talk and compelling tone made for sound art and a sounder sermon. The audience reacted accordingly. Mr. Copland's orchestral ode to Lincoln belongs in a class with Carl Sandburg's warm-spun prose.

It was a night of tributes. Before turning to the Copland novelty Mr. Koussevitzky conducted Sergei Rachmaninoff's tone poem, the Isle of the Dead, in memory of the great Russian composer who died last Sunday. Both pieces were read in flawless, expressive vein. So was Handel's D minor concerto grosso, opening the program.

As far as fiery power and brilliant tone went, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony—listed last—was the smash hit of the program. This massive work grows even more with rehearing.

The slow movement welled up in a steady surge of tone to a level of peak tension unlike anything else in music. The Boston strings certainly nit high there. The sweeping pace and vigor of the march finale brought on a stormy ovation.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony

The Eoston Symphony Orchestra will pay its respects to the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 9 and 10. Rachmaninoff many times appeared as a composer and as soloist at these concerts. Serge Koussevitzky, his colleague and fellow country man, announces the Symphony No. in E minor for the second portion of the program.

Emma Boynet, the distinguished French pianist, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts, appearing with the Orchestra in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat

This will be the first performance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of this particular concerto. The program will open with Two Preludes of Bach, arranged for String Orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli. Also on this program, Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," will be repeated. The actor Will Geer will again be the speaker of a text drawn from the letters and speeches of Abraham Lincoln.

★ ★ ★

The soloists are announced for the spring Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on Eastern Sunday afternoon, April 25, in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will present on this program the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, to be preceded by the Third Leanore) Overture of the same composer. The quartet of soloists will be Irma Gonzales, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor, and Julius Huen, bass. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, will assist the orchestra.

There was no doubt a dramatic symbolism as musical balance implied in the conclusion with Beethoven's incomparable Symphony of Liberty. The eerie premonitions of the schezo and the wildly victorious finale brought conductor and orchestra salvos of applause.

[61]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR

Music by Renowned Composers On Program of Koussevitzky

Music by four renowned composers written in their prime of life will be on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play Sunday at 3 p. m. in Rutgers University gymnasium.

Mozart will be represented with his Symphony in C Major (K. 338), one of about half a hundred symphonies he composed and deemed a fine example of his work in the field. The composer, who lived only to 35 years, produced this symphony in his early 20's. Always composing with a spontaneous perfection, he was continually at the height of his genius.

The selection which the audience will probably await with the most interest will be Beethoven's familiar Fifth Symphony in C minor. Beethoven, who was constantly in the toils of an emotional problem, a financial crisis or physical disabilities, had a dozen or so fairly happy years in the middle of his life. During this period, when he had long since found himself in terms of musical expression, although he had not reached the prodigious heights of his last years, he composed the Fifth Symphony.

Maurice Ravel, the late French composer, was 35 when he wrote the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet [illegible] 1910. The ballet, produced by the famous Diaghileff in 1912, was immediately acclaimed. The music was later arranged in two orchestra suites, of which the second, a marvel of orchestration and a marvel of tone as produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the program Sunday.

The fourth composition, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," was also at one time produced as a ballet by Nijinsky for Diaghileff, although this creation met little favor with the composer, Claude Debussy.

Debussy began this composition in 1892 at the age of 30, inspired by a poem by Stephane Mallarme of the symbolist school. Originally he had intended the work to have three sections, but only the prelude materialized. It was first performed late in 1894 on a program with works of Glazounov, Saint-Saens, Cesar Franck and some lesser composers; but the Debussy composition, although pronounced "interesting," produced no great stir. Now, typical of his subtle style, his shifting musical light and shadow, and elusive harmonies, the work has long been a favorite with audiences everywhere.

Tickets are on sale at the Rutgers Music House, College avenue, and will be available at the gymnasium before the performance Sunday.—M. P.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

APR 3- 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Plays Two American Works In Final Boston Program at the Academy

What with two American works and Beethoven's "Victory" Symphony, Koussevitzky's final program with the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music last night could have had a patriotic motive. There was plenty of cause for it aside from the Beethoven, for both American works were duly appreciated, while the applause of the evening went to Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which had had its first New York performance the previous evening in Carnegie Hall.

That Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland has written one of his most interesting and most compelling works was made more apparent on a second hearing. His stamp is on this work with all its "hollow" intervals, its trumpets and its economy of statement, but there is a fuller scoring that makes the work more substantial without taking anything away froom its originality. This music expresses purpose, it has meaning, and it builds up to a moving dramatic climax.

It will be argued that the spoken words, given so characteristically and so understandingly by Will Geer, may detract from the score, that music without words could have done as well or better. With other music, that might have been so, but to this listener the words are an integral part of the conception of the work as a whole and a logical outcome of the way in which Copland has worked through his score. Profounder music could have relied on its own eloquence, but this is a modern portrait, not necessarily one of the great masterpieces of all time. Copland has grasped the significance of his subject and drawn his portrait in accordance with the materials with which he works. Those words of Lincoln are immortal words; they have their own eloquence. Copland no doubt recognized that fact; he has not robbed them of effect, he has thrown them into greater relief by means of his musical plan.

The other American work was Samuel Barber's "Essy for Orchestra," a skillfully conceived and neatly executed work which says something in its own way, too. It sounds well and it is well sustained though, strangely enough, it left an impression of being just a bit old-fashioned. Like that of the Copland work, the performance was one of comprehension and of conviction on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

This program opened with the Handel Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Opus 6, No. 10. It is a charming work. All the perfection of its style was completely realized in the performance, one in which delicacy and refinement marked the acme of playing for this orchestra. They had played it the evening before, but this performance was a finer one.

There was a subdued air about Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Beethoven. It expressed a thoughtful restraint from heroics. If anything, the symphony was too nicely played. One would question the broad tempo of the third movement and wonder at the sharpness of the dramatic contrasts which left a less unified impression of the work as a whole.

BARBARA CUSTANCE, Canadian pianist, will give her first Town Hall recital Monday evening, 8:30 o'clock.

BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Premiere Here of His Secular Cantata No. 2 Given at Final Carnegie Hall Concert

New York Times

BARBER 'ESSAY' OFFERED

Abs. of

Copland's 'Lincoln' Heard—Harvard, Radcliffe Singers Assist Boston Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who, in a recent New York season of Boston Symphony concerts devoted his first two programs to American music, has made his last two concerts in this city of the series of 1942-43 principally of the works of native songs. Three of these figured in the final program of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They were William Schuman with his secular cantata, "A Free Song" after Whitman, for mixed chorus and orchestra, played for the first time in this city; Samuel Barber, whose "Essay for Orchestra, No. 1," followed, and Aaron Copland. His "Lincoln Portrait," for diseur and orchestra, was repeated following its New York première of Thursday. The second half was a tactful reversion to classicism, in the instance of Beethoven's immortally dramatic Fifth Symphony.

Written in Choral Way

Sometimes Mr. Schuman writes in a choral way for chorus and sometimes, with voices as well as orchestra, he devotes himself to the instrumental style. The first of his settings of Whitman verses which form his text is written in the former way, and at an initial hearing this is the best part of the cantata. The score contains much dexterous writing, but some that does not fall upon the ear as a spontaneous and unforced musical speech. This, of course, may not be so. A musical terminology which is unfamiliar can become with usage the accepted and conventional idiom of a later day. These things have happened.

Privately we don't think they are yet happening with Mr. Schuman. We think he has yet to find himself and his native style as a composer. In the meantime his experiments are usually provocative and suggestive of leads struck out which may conduct the author to very desirable places. The opening lines of "Long, Too Long, America" sound a summons and a challenge that goes straight over the footlights. The progress of this first part of the cantata is fundamentally dramatic and has much that is suggestive in the writing for orchestra as well as voices. Part two comes through well at the end, with ahe apostrophe to liberty. There are sandier stretches between, where the use of the fugue formula does not recompense for the absence of a commanding utterance.

Barber's Work Discussed

Mr. Barber's is excellent writing, not earth-shaking, or in any way prophetic of revolution, but in its form and logic of treatment, and refreshing sense of direction, of the composer knowing exactly what he wants to do, and skilfully doing it, is good work, music that has both contour and mood. Mr. Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" was first heard here the preceding Thursday evening and at the time received critical discussion in these columns. His methods are interesting. He has given us an instrumental background for texts taken from certain speeches of Lincoln, and in a score conspicuous for brevity has based two parts of it on American folk-tunes. Thus he shows, as he also shows in his best ballet music of recent vintage, the value of native folk-melody as material for manipulation by the modern composer.

The question, of course, is then the manner of manipulation. The audience gave all three of these compositions a cordial reception. Messrs. Schuman and Barber, the latter in army uniform, with Mr. Will Geer, the reciter of the occasion, Lincolnian in stature and designedly nasal of speech in traditional manner, were repeatedly called back to the stage. Most of the music of this first half of the program was essentially dramatic in thought. Also called to the stage was G. Wallace Woodworth [illegible] ductor of the Radcliffe Cho[illegible]ony-ciety and the Harva[illegible] Glee [illegible], which organizations [illegible] ken [illegible] oin its performance of Mr. Schuman's music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 2- 1943

Bostonians in Tribute to Lincoln

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Will Geer, Broadway actor, acting as narrator-spokesman for Abe Lincoln, the Boston Symphony Orchestra unveiled Aaron Copland's A. Lincoln Portrait to rousing applause in Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Standing at Mr. Koussevitzky's left, Mr. Geer read timely truths on freedom and democracy from the Great Commoner's speeches, ending with the last words of the Gettysburg address.

The score is one of Mr. Copland's best to date, if not the best. Freely woven into the fabric are fragments of tunes like Camptown Races and Springfield Mountain.

While all listeners will differ on any music's programmatic content, the Copland score does evoke an heroic mood, against which rises the image of a lone and simple man battling inhumanity.

Topped by the Gettysburg excerpt, the combination of exalted talk and compelling tone made for sound art and a sounder sermon. The audience reacted accordingly. Mr. Copland's orchestral ode to Lincoln belongs in a class with Carl Sandburg's warm-spun prose.

It was a night of tributes. Before turning to the Copland novelty Mr. Koussevitzky conducted Sergei Rachmaninoff's tone poem, the Isle of the Dead, in memory of the great Russian composer who died last Sunday. Both pieces were read in flawless, expressive vein. So was Handel's D minor concerto grosso, opening the program.

As far as fiery power and brilliant tone went, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony—listed last—was the smash hit of the program. This massive work grows even more with rehearing.

The slow movement welled up in a steady surge of tone to a level of peak tension unlike anything else in music. The Boston strings certainly nit high there. The sweeping pace and vigor of the march finale brought on a stormy ovation.

There was no doubt a dramatic symbolism as musical balance implied in the conclusion with Beethoven's incomparable Symphony of Liberty. The eerie premonitions of the schezo and the wildly victorious finale brought conductor and orchestra salves of applause.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its respects to the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 9 and 10. Rachmaninoff many times appeared as a composer and as soloist at these concerts. Serge Koussevitzky, his colleague and fellow country man, announces the Symphony No. in E minor for the second portion of the program.

Emma Boynet, the distinguished French pianist, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts, appearing with the Orchestra in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat

This will be the first performance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of this particular concerto. The program will open with Two Preludes of Bach, arranged for String Orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli. Also on this program, Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," will be repeated. The actor Will Geer will again be the speaker of a text drawn from the letters and speeches of Abraham Lincoln.

★ ★ ★

The soloists are announced for the spring Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given on Eastern Sunday afternoon, April 25, in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will present on this program the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, to be preceded by the Third Leanore) Overture of the same composer. The quartet of soloists will be Irma Gonzales, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor, and Julius Huen, bass. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, will assist the orchestra.

[61]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
APR 4 - 1943

Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, ranked first in this year's balloting for artists whom Springfield people want to hear next season.

Hemidemisemiquavers: Aaron Copland has written four original folk-type songs for the movie on Russia, "The North Star." Using lyrics by Ira Gershwin, Mr. Copland has done "No Village Like Mine," "Younger Generation," "Song of the Guerrillas" and "Collective Loading Time." . . . Avril Coleridge-Taylor, daughter of the late composer, Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, has written a symphony in tribute to General Douglas MacArthur and the Philippine campaign, "An Historic Episode." . . . In his recent war-bond concert in Providence, admission to which was by purchase of war bonds, Jascha Heifetz, violinist, produced $1,165,000 in sales. . . . The Weaver Piano Company, York, Pa., has developed a piano with a plastic plywood plate, plastic plywood action brackets and several other parts, reducing the critical material almost 50 per cent to less than 10 per cent of the weight of the instrument. . . . The name of Aram Khachaturian, young Soviet Armenian composer, will appear soon on a marble tablet in the hall of the Moscow Conservatory, where it will join the names of other famous alumni, including those of Rachmaninoff and Taneieff.

Darius Milhaud, French composer now living in California, has entered the dispute now going on in San Francisco concerning the inclusion of modern music in that city's symphony orchestra.

"I have just learned," he writes in a letter to the conductor, "that you have been asked to give up presenting contemporary works. * * * I shall at least have the consolation of knowing that it was not the presence of my works in your programs of the last two years which caused this veto imposed upon you."

The composer tells of sending the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra his "Second Suite Symphonique" last year, without its being produced, and of looking forward this year to hearing Mr. Monteux direct his "Opus Americanum," No. 21, dedicated to the conductor.

"I was very happy to be able to reserve the first world audition of this work for the San Francisco Symphony," he continues. "I see now that I shall have to forego the pleasure. * * * Even if there should be a change of attitude, following protests, I prefer definitely to withdraw this new work."

Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist, has been meeting wartime adventures in his concert tour of this country, including a five-hour ride in a box car of a freight train to get to an engagement in Iowa. The four wooden benches provided for the passengers to sit on were so unsteady that they almost tipped over with every jolt of the train. The only light was provided by a brakeman's lantern. In one city, the piano arrived only fifteen minutes before the recital was scheduled to begin, and the audience broke into cheers when stagehands finally rolled the instrument into position.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 4 - 1943

FEATURE U. S. COMPOSERS IN CONCERT HERE

By GRENA BENNETT

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's farewell concert for the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky devoted the greater part of the program to works by young American composers.

The opening number was William Schumann's secular cantata, "A Free Song," which had its inspiration in three poems by Whitman, all of patriotic flavor.

The cantata possesses much that is heroic in its fabric and suggests the import and impulse of the poems. The performance, the first in this city, was a credit to both the singers and the instrumentalists. The vocalists were members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Mr. Schumann was recalled twice, sharing the applause with G. Walter Woodworth, conductor of the chorus.

Samuel Barber's Essay for orchestra and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" were the other works by native composers. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was the final offering.

* * *

AT BALLET THEATRE.

The Ballet Theatre's program at its first matinee yesterday attracted a soldout house to the Metropolitan. "Swan Lake" was the initial bill with Markova refreshingly delightful as the Queen of the Swans and Anton Dolin as the romantic Prince Siegfried. Laughter from the many children present mingled with Prokofieff's quaintly melodic music in "Peter and the Wolf."

In the droll fairy ballet were Yura Lazovsky as Peter; Nora Kaye, the Bird; Jean Hunt, a Duck; Sono Ozato, the sly Cat; Hugh Laing, the Grandfather; and Rex Cooper, the bad, bad Wolf.

Antal Durati was again in charge of the orchestra for "Coppelia" presented by Hightower, Eglevsky and Semenoff as the leading dancers.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 4 - 1943

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, assisted by Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The program:

"A Free Song," Secular Cantata No. 2 ..... Schuman
(First New York performance)
Essay No. 1 ..... Barber
A Lincoln Portrait ..... Copland
(Will Geer, speaker)
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

Superficially Warlike

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall a program without much inner unity. Such external cohesion as it had consisted of indirect references to the war. But musically the works played seemed rather to contradict one another than to set one another off.

* * *

The title of Mr. William Schuman's secular cantata, "A Free Song," refers, I take it, since the composition is partly fugal in style, not to musical freedom but to freedom of some other kind, economic, social, religious, amorous or political, no doubt. The times being what they are, one would probably be safe in betting it was the latter, though of certain evidence I have none, the chorus's effective enunciation of the text being zero in row U. The music's intrinsic interest seemed, also, to this listener to add up to a not high figure.

* * *

Private Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra, No. 1," is a pretty piece but not a very strong one. It resembles more a meditation than it does the kind of logical exposition one usually associates with the classical prose form of that name. Perhaps Mr. Barber thinks of the word essay in its contemporary sense of a reflective composition on some relatively trivial subject. Certainly his musical material here is not striking. Neither, unfortunately, is his development of it, though there is, as always in this composer's music, grace. The military note was added to this performance by the composer's presence, bowing, in uniform.

* * *

Mr. Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" consists of a pastorale, a scherzo and a melodrama. The first is plain but pleasant; the second, a sort of County Fair scene made up of phrases out of Stephen Foster, is brilliantly picturesque. Lincoln himself comes into the portrait only by quotation, when an actor (yesterday it was Mr. Will Geer) speaks, as finale, over a slight orchestral accompaniment selected passages from the addresses of the great President. Even if Mr. Geer had not seen fit to utter these in the flat and twangy accent usually adopted in theatrical productions to characterize Vermont storekeepers, they would still have seemed, for all their grandeur, an unhappy ending to a musical work.

* * *

It is not easy to make a portrait of a person no longer living, as any artist will tell you. But the problem, difficult or not, is what it is; and Mr. Copland has chosen to essay it. By leaving off in the middle and simply inserting quotations from Mr. Lincoln's speeches, he has achieved a result comparable to what a painter would achieve if, after sketching in a period background of some kind, he were to substitute for a full rendering of his subject a half-dozen snapshots taken at various periods of the latter's life. Including something from the war period, of course.

* * *

The afternoon ended with an excellent performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of which the principal theme is currently thought to resemble the letter V in Morse code—three dots and a dash. This theme really consists, in its most frequent statement, of four dots and in its initial, or motto, form of three dots and something the length of about fifteen dashes, a signal not admitted, so far as I know, in any telegraphic alphabet. Yesterday's rendition was a fine one, all the same.

William Schuman

Whose cantata, "A Free Song," was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday

Symphony to Honor Rachmaninoff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its respects to the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 9 and 10, when Serge Koussevitzky, his colleague and fellow countryman, will conduct the Symphony No. 2 in E minor for the second portion of the program.

Emma Boynet, the distinguished French pianist, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts, appearing with the orchestra in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat (K. No. 271). This will be the first performance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of this particular concerto, a product of its composer's 21st year.

The program will open with Two Preludes of Bach, arranged for String Orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli. They are the Prelude to the Organ Fugue in D minor, and the Prelude to the E major Partita for Violin Unaccompanied. Also on this program, Aaron Copland's, "A Lincoln Portrait," performed at the last pair of Symphony concerts in Boston, will be repeated. The actor, Will Geer, will again be the speaker of a text drawn from the letters and speeches of Abraham Lincoln.

Last Symphony in Extra Series on April 12

The final concert of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will take place a week from Monday, April 12, and Tuesday, April 13. Serge Koussevitzky announces for this program a Theme with Variations by Arcady Dubensky, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

[6a]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
APR 4 - 1943

Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, ranked first in this year's balloting for artists whom Springfield people want to hear next season.

Hemidemisemiquavers: Aaron Copland has written four original folk-type songs for the movie on Russia, "The North Star." Using lyrics by Ira Gershwin, Mr. Copland has done "No Village Like Mine," "Younger Generation," "Song of the Guerrillas" and "Collective Loading Time." . . . Avril Coleridge-Taylor, daughter of the late composer, Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, has written a symphony in tribute to General Douglas MacArthur and the Philippine campaign, "An Historic Episode." . . . In his recent war-bond concert in Providence, admission to which was by purchase of war bonds, Jascha Heifetz, violinist, produced $1,165,000 in sales. . . . The Weaver Piano Company, York, Pa., has developed a piano with a plastic plywood plate, plastic plywood action brackets and several other parts, reducing the critical material almost 50 per cent to less than 10 per cent of the weight of the instrument. . . . The name of Aram Khachaturian, young Soviet Armenian composer, will appear soon on a marble tablet in the hall of the Moscow Conservatory, where it will join the names of other famous alumni, including those of Rachmaninoff and Taneieff.

Darius Milhaud, French composer now living in California, has entered the dispute now going on in San Francisco concerning the inclusion of modern music in that city's symphony orchestra.

"I have just learned," he writes in a letter to the conductor, "that you have been asked to give up presenting contemporary works. * * * I shall at least have the consolation of knowing that it was not the presence of my works in your programs of the last two years which caused this veto imposed upon you."

The composer tells of sending the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra his "Second Suite Symphonique" last year, without its being produced, and of looking forward this year to hearing Mr. Monteux direct his "Opus Americanum," No. 21, dedicated to the conductor.

"I was very happy to be able to reserve the first world audition of this work for the San Francisco Symphony," he continues. "I see now that I shall have to forego the pleasure. * * * Even if there should be a change of attitude, following protests, I prefer definitely to withdraw this new work."

Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist, has been meeting wartime adventures in his concert tour of this country, including a five-hour ride in a box car of a freight train to get to an engagement in Iowa. The four wooden benches provided for the passengers to sit on were so unsteady that they almost tipped over with every jolt of the train. The only light was provided by a brakeman's lantern. In one city, the piano arrived only fifteen minutes before the recital was scheduled to begin, and the audience broke into cheers when stagehands finally rolled the instrument into position.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 4 - 1943

FEATURE U. S. COMPOSERS IN CONCERT HERE

By GRENA BENNETT

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's farewell concert for the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky devoted the greater part of the program to works by young American composers.

The opening number was William Schumann's secular cantata, "A Free Song," which had its inspiration in three poems by Whitman, all of patriotic flavor.

The cantata possesses much that is heroic in its fabric and suggests the import and impulse of the poems. The performance, the first in this city, was a credit to both the singers and the instrumentalists. The vocalists were members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Mr. Schumann was recalled twice, sharing the applause with G. Walter Woodworth, conductor of the chorus.

Samuel Barber's Essay for orchestra and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" were the other works by native composers. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was the final offering.

* * *

AT BALLET THEATRE.

The Ballet Theatre's program at its first matinee yesterday attracted a soldout house to the Metropolitan. "Swan Lake" was the initial bill with Markova refreshingly delightful as the Queen of the Swans and Anton Dolin as the romantic Prince Siegfried. Laughter from the many children present mingled with Prokofieff's quaintly melodic music in "Peter and the Wolf."

In the droll fairy ballet were Yura Lazovsky as Peter; Nora Kaye, the Bird; Jean Hunt, a Duck; Sono Ozato, the sly Cat; Hugh Laing, the Grandfather; and Rex Cooper, the bad, bad Wolf.

Antal Durati was again in charge of the orchestra for "Coppelia" presented by Hightower, Eglevsky and Semenoff as the leading dancers.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 4 - 1943

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, assisted by Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The program:

"A Free Song," Secular Cantata No. 2 ..... Schuman
(First New York performance)
Essay No. 1 ..... Barber
A Lincoln Portrait ..... Copland
(Will Geer, speaker)
Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

Superficially Warlike

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall a program without much inner unity. Such external cohesion as it had consisted of indirect references to the war. But musically the works played seemed rather to contradict one another than to set one another off.

* * *

The title of Mr. William Schuman's secular cantata, "A Free Song," refers, I take it, since the composition is partly fugal in style, not to musical freedom but to freedom of some other kind, economic, social, religious, amorous or political, no doubt. The times being what they are, one would probably be safe in betting it was the latter, though of certain evidence I have none, the chorus's effective enunciation of the text being zero in row U. The music's intrinsic interest seemed, also, to this listener to add up to a not high figure.

* * *

Private Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra, No. 1," is a pretty piece but not a very strong one. It resembles more a meditation than it does the kind of logical exposition one usually associates with the classical prose form of that name. Perhaps Mr. Barber thinks of the word essay in its contemporary sense of a reflective composition on some relatively trivial subject. Certainly his musical material here is not striking. Neither, unfortunately, is his development of it, though there is, as always in this composer's music, grace. The military note was added to this performance by the composer's presence, bowing, in uniform.

* * *

Mr. Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" consists of a pastorale, a scherzo and a melodrama. The first is plain but pleasant; the second, a sort of County Fair scene made up of phrases out of Stephen Foster, is brilliantly picturesque. Lincoln himself comes into the portrait only by quotation, when an actor (yesterday it was Mr. Will Geer) speaks, as finale, over a slight orchestral accompaniment selected passages from the addresses of the great President. Even if Mr. Geer had not seen fit to utter these in the flat and twangy accent usually adopted in theatrical productions to characterize Vermont storekeepers, they would still have seemed, for all their grandeur, an unhappy ending to a musical work.

* * *

It is not easy to make a portrait of a person no longer living, as any artist will tell you. But the problem, difficult or not, is what it is; and Mr. Copland has chosen to essay it. By leaving off in the middle and simply inserting quotations from Mr. Lincoln's speeches, he has achieved a result comparable to what a painter would achieve if, after sketching in a period background of some kind, he were to substitute for a full rendering of his subject a half-dozen snapshots taken at various periods of the latter's life. Including something from the war period, of course.

* * *

The afternoon ended with an excellent performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of which the principal theme is currently thought to resemble the letter V in Morse code—three dots and a dash. This theme really consists, in its most frequent statement, of four dots and in its initial, or motto, form of three dots and something the length of about fifteen dashes, a signal not admitted, so far as I know, in any telegraphic alphabet. Yesterday's rendition was a fine one, all the same.

William Schuman

Whose cantata, "A Free Song," was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday

Symphony to Honor Rachmaninoff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its respects to the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 9 and 10, when Serge Koussevitzky, his colleague and fellow countryman, will conduct the Symphony No. 2 in E minor for the second portion of the program.

Emma Boynet, the distinguished French pianist, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts, appearing with the orchestra in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat (K. No. 271). This will be the first performance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of this particular concerto, a product of its composer's 21st year.

The program will open with Two Preludes of Bach, arranged for String Orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli. They are the Prelude to the Organ Fugue in D minor, and the Prelude to the E major Partita for Violin Unaccompanied. Also on this program, Aaron Copland's, "A Lincoln Portrait," performed at the last pair of Symphony concerts in Boston, will be repeated. The actor, Will Geer, will again be the speaker of a text drawn from the letters and speeches of Abraham Lincoln.

Last Symphony in Extra Series on April 12

The final concert of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will take place a week from Monday, April 12, and Tuesday, April 13. Serge Koussevitzky announces for this program a Theme with Variations by Arcady Dubensky, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

[6a]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 5 - 1943

Themes and Variations

By Henry Simon

Musical Diary

Friday, April 2—The news of Erich Leinsdorf's appointment as permanent conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra is good news—for Cleveland. I've observed Mr. Leinsdorf rehearse and direct a symphony orchestra (which he's done comparatively seldom for such an important assignment), and there's no question that he has lots to bring both as an interpreter and as an efficient, non-time-wasting organizer. A good sign was that the men, a canny lot, were enthusiastic about him.

* * *

Saturday—The first half of Serge Koussevitzky's matinee with the Boston Symphony was composed by three living Americans. The level was extremely high. First came a New York premiere of William Schuman's Cantata A Free Song with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society singing lustily but not enunciating Walt Whitman's text too distinctly. The three passages from Whitman's Drum Taps have a poignant message for us today. They make the point, in powerful free verse, that suffering and war can awaken this nation from self-satisfaction to a new understanding of liberty. The Schuman setting was dramatically striking, using simple melodic themes and contrasting rhythms appropriate to the simple emotions Whitman wrote about. It's also written with obvious mastery of what a chorus can be expected to do easily, though I'm not sure that some of the apparently poor diction was not the result of overheavy orchestration here and there.

I hadn't heard Samuel Bearber's Essay for Orchestra in several years and forgotten how remarkable it is for its expression of intense, individual emotion without ever straining at the seams for effect. Architecturally, too, it's a little masterpiece. The composer, looking very youthful in his Army uniform (he's 33) received a warm reception.

The third American item was a repetition of Aaron Copland's A Lincoln Portrait. I'm afraid that in my review for Friday's PM I didn't give Mr. Copland adequate credit either for the strong and simple prose lines with which he strung together the quotations from Lincoln himself, or for the skill with which he built his portrait to a point where the homely, folksy Springfield Mountain tune made an appropriate background for the noble close of the Gettysburg Address. Will Geer's nasality was, I thought, just as right for the lines as his build for the role.

* * *

Sunday—On its broadcast afternoon concert, the Philharmonic opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the singingest, happiest symphony in all the standard repertoire. Fritz Reiner conducted it for all the singing qualities, but never exaggerating the melodies into sentimentality, as some do with this work. Gregor Piatigorsky then showed, with the Schumann Concerto, why he is the most widely admired cellist living in America today. It's his tone, his rhythmic sense, his phrasing. his technique. What more can you want?

Later in the afternoon, Arturo Toscanini, returning to the NBC Symphony, put on a pops program that started with the Zampa Overture and ended with the Second Hungarian Rhapsody and Stars and Stripes Forever—zowie! He didn't play down to the music or play it up—just straight—thus proving what every right-minded citizen knows popular music can be great stuff.

This Clipping From CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL-REPUBLIC
APR 6 - 1943

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and directors of the organizations concerned, including the Boston Symphony, have decided not to renew the Berkshire Music Center this summer because of war conditions, including transportation.

However, it is only a suspension and plans are being made to reopen the center on the same scale as soon as war conditions permit.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages and the public as well will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, especially music."

* * *

SYMPHONY IN SERIOUS MOOD

Tribute to Rachmaninoff Marks Programme

Apr 9, 1943

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was inevitable that Dr. Koussevitzky should play something by Rachmaninoff at this week's pair of Symphony concerts and almost as inevitable that something should be the Second Symphony.

The impressive tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," which the orchestra played in New York last week, had been heard here earlier in the season when there was no thought of the solemn purpose it might be called upon to serve so soon. Both the Second and Third Concertos show the late composer in his best estate but they require a piano soloist and the programme already had one in Emma Boynet, who was scheduled to take part in a much needed revival of d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," for which the Rachmaninoff E minor was substituted.

But if the last-named work, to return to it, has not withstood too well the ravages of time (it goes back to 1906) it received yesterday afternoon a fervent devoted performance that brought out what measure of strength and beauty is still to be found in it.

In the first part of the programme, partly designed for the radio listeners, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to stick to his original intentions which included, besides the Mozart Concerto, the two Bach Preludes as arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, last heard here in 1936, and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which was introduced to Symphony Hall two weeks ago and was repeated presumably for the benefit of the radio listeners aforementioned.

Of Mr. Copland's curious experiment in composition there is nothing new to be said. Again Will Geer in a voice of intentioned harshness spoke the Lincoln lines of the third division against an orchestral accompaniment completely lacking in significance. As the piece now stands, the first two sections are no more than an effective prelude to a third that fails to come off.

The little Mozart Concerto, chiefly of interest to students of the composer's evolution, was to have served Mme. Boynet as a sort of curtain-raiser to the d'Indy. She played it neatly and musically and with the proper degree of expression in the slow movement in which the 21-year-old Mozart becomes surprisingly serious. The Bach Preludes made fitting introduction to the lightly scored Concerto with its fragile piano part. They also cast the spotlight on the Boston Symphony strings, a procedure that Dr. Koussevitzky loves.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 14 1943

USO Plans Rare

Complete recording, which is rarely heard, of the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis" will be the interesting music presented as the Music Appreciation Hour program at the Covenant House U S O branch Wednesday at 8:30 p. m., open to service men and the public alike.

It is played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky, with Harvard Glee club and Westminster choir participating, according to announcement by Hans Alsfons Illing, who is in charge of the program.

[63]

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
APR 5 - 1943

3,100 Attend Sunday Concert By Boston Orchestra in Gym

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Inspirational Presentation of Four Great Composers' Contributions

By MARY PURNELL

It takes a program like that played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rutgers Gymnasium to measure the full accomplishment of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his players.

The concert, which was heard by a capacity audience of 3,100 persons, consisted of some familiar works of four of the great composers, certain to have been for some time favorites of those present. On the program were Mozart's Symphony in C Major 34 (K. No. 338); The Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy, inspired by a poem of the symbolist Stephane Mallarme; the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite of Ravel; and finally Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 In C minor.

To add deeper meaning to the already significant, to restate in fresh, glowing tones the familiar message of beloved works was, then, the task of the orchestra, a standard by which the distinctive, individual genius of players and conductor may be most fully realized.

Beethoven emerged as the high spot of the afternoon, with a memorable performance that spoke directly of the great heart and noble intellect which conceived the symphony. The enigmatic third movement was strikingly played and it swept with absorbing interest into the full-blooded glories of the final movement.

It is on great classics like this that conductors sometimes like to put the stamp of their personalities with the result that the symphony has often been the victim of mannerisms and even of a whipped up tempo that produced a grim, relentless interpretation. It is to Dr. Koussevitzky's credit that he showed his authority by letting Beethoven's own voice have free expression.

Discovering in the opening notes of the work the rhythm of the Morse code letter V, Allied propagandists have linked this symphony to the V-for-Victory campaign and have hailed it as the symbol of striving for liberty. Those who had this thought in mind must have found such a performance very satisfying, for the V-rhythm which they have fastened on for their purposes is the very pulse and animating force of the work.

However, it may some day be regretted that this symphony has been artificially connected with such a campaign, an alliance that will provide material for centuries for the Sherlock Holmes school of musical commentators, who love best to dream up strange meanings and interpretations of straightforward classics.

Besides this work the audiences will not soon forget the impact of the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite, the climax of the first part of the program. Given the same electrifying performance here some years ago, the suite almost overwhelmed the audience. Yesterday its effectiveness was thus anticipated; but matchless tone of the orchestra and the exhilarating rhythms still made it a work to prickle the scalp and tingle the spine.

In this and the Debussy piece the members of the orchestra demonstrated their usual superiority as instrumentalists. The delicious beauty of the woodwinds in the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the shimmering strings and thrilling brasses left nothing to be desired.

In company with these arresting works, the delicate Mozart symphony had its own peculiar charm. Written in only three movements, it had a neat, precise and truly Mozartian opening Allegro vivace. The delicate strings of the second movement presented a tenuous grace which contrasted well with the hearty finale.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" opened the program.

The audience, whose musical fare has been slim this year, was like a starving man who finally has a meal. There was resounding applause.

The fact that 3,100 could surmount the obstacles of transportation and the pressure of wartime duties is certainly convincing proof of the value of music to morale at this time. It is to be hoped that this demonstration will indicate the wisdom of re-establishing the Rutgers concert series in the usual manner next season. There were many new faces in the audience yesterday, including a great number of those in service, a sign that people are turning increasingly to the solace of music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 7 - 1943
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 7 - 1943

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Last in Series of Five Concerts

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the last of its five concerts for the season in Metropolitan Theatre last night. There was the customary large and responsive audience.

In memory of Rachmaninoff, his tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," was played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The program also included a recent novelty, "A Lincoln Portrait," by Aaron Copland.

Dr. Koussevitzky began with a concerto grosso by Handel, in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, a pleasant set of sounds. The strings delivered it with charm and fluency; once or twice, in pizzicato, they were ever so slightly out of step. Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, violins, and Bedetti, 'cello, received special recognition from conductor and audience for their labors.

It might have been better to remember Rachmaninoff by some other work than "The Island of the Dead." It has moments of impassioned sonority but it is not, all in all, an interesting piece, and it contains many plain reminderse of other composers. Dr. Koussevitzky was obviously working like mad to get something out of it, but the attempt was only moderately significant.

Mr. Copland's piece requires the aid of a speaking voice; it is a patchwork of Lincoln utterances sewed together by fairly unrelated biography and comment. A composer who undertakes to set Lincoln to music has not much else to do than to stand out of the way, because Lincoln's words are already orchestra and music. Mr. Copland puts forth a lively prologue aimed to evoke the turbulent atmosphere of Lincoln's presidential years and then subsides to an effective comment while the words are being said. Will Geer, who looks something like the pictures of the young Lincoln, did the speaking and did it admirably. During the prelude his pained frown of one getting into the mood to be Abraham Lincoln was distracting, but when he got up to speak he, like Mr. Copland, didn't try to polish the words, he just let them go, and they were very moving. Though they were first spoken 80 years ago, they are words for today and words for tomorrow, words for individuals as well as words for nations. Mr. Copland has done well to bring them forward again.

The evening ended with Sibelius's second symphony, in D major. It was, of course, done with brilliance and refinement, which are noble virtues in an orchestra. But a touch of frenzy helps out in affairs of this kind, and, I am glad to report, there was this touch in the finale. The gentlemen from Boston were bowing, blowing and beating with that estimably controlled abandon that Dr. Koussevitzky wisely takes into the last movement of the last piece of the season. It was fine.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 5 - 1943

Themes and Variations

By Henry Simon

Musical Diary

Friday, April 2—The news of Erich Leinsdorf's appointment as permanent conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra is good news—for Cleveland. I've observed Mr. Leinsdorf rehearse and direct a symphony orchestra (which he's done comparatively seldom for such an important assignment), and there's no question that he has lots to bring both as an interpreter and as an efficient, non-time-wasting organizer. A good sign was that the men, a canny lot, were enthusiastic about him.

* * *

Saturday—The first half of Serge Koussevitzky's matinee with the Boston Symphony was composed by three living Americans. The level was extremely high. First came a New York premiere of William Schuman's Cantata A Free Song with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society singing lustily but not enunciating Walt Whitman's text too distinctly. The three passages from Whitman's Drum Taps have a poignant message for us today. They make the point, in powerful free verse, that suffering and war can awaken this nation from self-satisfaction to a new understanding of liberty. The Schuman setting was dramatically striking, using simple melodic themes and contrasting rhythms appropriate to the simple emotions Whitman wrote about. It's also written with obvious mastery of what a chorus can be expected to do easily, though I'm not sure that some of the apparently poor diction was not the result of overheavy orchestration here and there.

I hadn't heard Samuel Bearber's Essay for Orchestra in several years and forgotten how remarkable it is for its expression of intense, individual emotion without ever straining at the seams for effect. Architecturally, too, it's a little masterpiece. The composer, looking very youthful in his Army uniform (he's 33) received a warm reception.

The third American item was a repetition of Aaron Copland's A Lincoln Portrait. I'm afraid that in my review for Friday's PM I didn't give Mr. Copland adequate credit either for the strong and simple prose lines with which he strung together the quotations from Lincoln himself, or for the skill with which he built his portrait to a point where the homely, folksy Springfield Mountain tune made an appropriate background for the noble close of the Gettysburg Address. Will Geer's nasality was, I thought, just as right for the lines as his build for the role.

* * *

Sunday—On its broadcast afternoon concert, the Philharmonic opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the singingest, happiest symphony in all the standard repertoire. Fritz Reiner conducted it for all the singing qualities, but never exaggerating the melodies into sentimentality, as some do with this work. Gregor Piatigorsky then showed, with the Schumann Concerto, why he is the most widely admired cellist living in America today. It's his tone, his rhythmic sense, his phrasing, his technique. What more can you want?

Later in the afternoon, Arturo Toscanini, returning to the NBC Symphony, put on a pops program that started with the Zampa Overture and ended with the Second Hungarian Rhapsody and Stars and Stripes Forever—zowie! He didn't play down to the music or play it up—just straight—thus proving what every right-minded citizen knows popular music can be great stuff.

This Clipping From
CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL-REPUBLIC
APR 6 - 1943

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and directors of the organizations concerned, including the Boston Symphony, have decided not to renew the Berkshire Music Center this summer because of war conditions, including transportation.

However, it is only a suspension and plans are being made to reopen the center on the same scale as soon as war conditions permit.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages and the public as well will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, especially music."

* * *

SYMPHONY IN SERIOUS MOOD

Tribute to Rachmaninoff Marks Programme

Apr 7, 1943

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was inevitable that Dr. Koussevitzky should play something by Rachmaninoff at this week's pair of Symphony concerts and almost as inevitable that something should be the Second Symphony.

The impressive tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," which the orchestra played in New York last week, had been heard here earlier in the season when there was no thought of the solemn purpose it might be called upon to serve so soon. Both the Second and Third Concertos show the late composer in his best estate but they require a piano soloist and the programme already had one in Emma Boynet, who was scheduled to take part in a much needed revival of d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," for which the Rachmaninoff E minor was substituted.

But if the last-named work, to return to it, has not withstood too well the ravages of time (it goes back to 1906) it received yesterday afternoon a fervent devoted performance that brought out what measure of strength and beauty is still to be found in it.

In the first part of the programme, partly designed for the radio listeners, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to stick to his original intentions which included, besides the Mozart Concerto, the two Bach Preludes as arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, last heard here in 1936, and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which was introduced to Symphony Hall two weeks ago and was repeated presumably for the benefit of the radio listeners aforementioned.

Of Mr. Copland's curious experiment in composition there is nothing new to be said. Again Will Geer in a voice of intentioned harshness spoke the Lincoln lines of the third division against an orchestral accompaniment completely lacking in significance. As the piece now stands, the first two sections are no more than an effective prelude to a third that fails to come off.

The little Mozart Concerto, chiefly of interest to students of the composer's evolution, was to have served Mme. Boynet as a sort of curtain-raiser to the d'Indy. She played it neatly and musically and with the proper degree of expression in the slow movement in which the 21-year-old Mozart becomes surprisingly serious. The Bach Preludes made fitting introduction to the lightly scored Concerto with its fragile piano part. They also cast the spotlight on the Boston Symphony strings, a procedure that Dr. Koussevitzky loves.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 14 1943

U S O Plans Rare

Complete recording, which is rarely heard, of the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis" will be the interesting music presented as the Music Appreciation Hour program at the Covenant House U S O branch Wednesday at 8:30 p. m., open to service men and the public alike.

It is played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky, with Harvard Glee club and Westminster choir participating, according to announcement by Hans Alsfons Illing, who is in charge of the program.

[63]

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
APR 5 - 1943

3,100 Attend Sunday Concert By Boston Orchestra in Gym

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Inspirational Presentation of Four Great Composers' Contributions

By MARY PURNELL

It takes a program like that played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rutgers Gymnasium to measure the full accomplishment of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his players.

The concert, which was heard by a capacity audience of 3,100 persons, consisted of some familiar works of four of the great composers, certain to have been for some time favorites of those present. On the program were Mozart's Symphony in C Major 34 (K. No. 338); The Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy, inspired by a poem of the symbolist Stephane Mallarme; the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite of Ravel; and finally Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 In C minor.

To add deeper meaning to the already significant, to restate in fresh, glowing tones the familiar message of beloved works was, then, the task of the orchestra, a standard by which the distinctive, individual genius of players and conductor may be most fully realized.

Beethoven emerged as the high spot of the afternoon, with a memorable performance that spoke directly of the great heart and noble intellect which conceived the symphony. The enigmatic third movement was strikingly played and it swept with absorbing interest into the full-blooded glories of the final movement.

It is on great classics like this that conductors sometimes like to put the stamp of their personalities with the result that the symphony has often been the victim of mannerisms and even of a whipped up tempo that produced a grim, relentless interpretation. It is to Dr. Koussevitzky's credit that he showed his authority by letting Beethoven's own voice have free expression.

Discovering in the opening notes of the work the rhythm of the Morse code letter V, Allied propagandists have linked this symphony to the V-for-Victory campaign and have hailed it as the symbol of striving for liberty. Those who had this thought in mind must have found such a performance very satisfying, for the V-rhythm which they have fastened on for their purposes is the very pulse and animating force of the work.

However, it may some day be regretted that this symphony has been artificially connected with such a campaign, an alliance that will provide material for centuries for the Sherlock Holmes school of musical commentators, who love best to dream up strange meanings and interpretations of straightforward classics.

Besides this work the audiences will not soon forget the impact of the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite, the climax of the first part of the program. Given the same electrifying performance here some years ago, the suite almost overwhelmed the audience. Yesterday its effectiveness was thus anticipated; but matchless tone of the orchestra and the exhilarating rhythms still made it a work to prickle the scalp and tingle the spine.

In this and the Debussy piece the members of the orchestra demonstrated their usual superiority as instrumentalists. The delicious beauty of the woodwinds in the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the shimmering strings and thrilling brasses left nothing to be desired.

In company with these arresting works, the delicate Mozart symphony had its own peculiar charm. Written in only three movements, it had a neat, precise and truly Mozartian opening Allegro vivace. The delicate strings of the second movement presented a tenuous grace which contrasted well with the hearty finale.

"The Star-Spangled Banner" opened the program.

The audience, whose musical fare has been slim this year, was like a starving man who finally has a meal. There was resounding applause.

The fact that 3,100 could surmount the obstacles of transportation and the pressure of wartime duties is certainly convincing proof of the value of music to morale at this time. It is to be hoped that this demonstration will indicate the wisdom of re-establishing the Rutgers concert series in the usual manner next season. There were many new faces in the audience yesterday, including a great number of those in service, a sign that people are turning increasingly to the solace of music.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 7 - 1943

MUSIC

Last in Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra Given at Metropolitan.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the last of its five concerts for the season in Metropolitan Theatre last night. There was the customary large and responsive audience.

In memory of Rachmaninoff, his tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," was played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The program also included a recent novelty, "A Lincoln Portrait," by Aaron Copland.

Dr. Koussevitzky began with a concerto grosso by Handel, in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10, a pleasant set of sounds. The strings delivered it with charm and fluency; once or twice, in pizzicato, they were ever so slightly out of step. Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, violins, and Bedetti, 'cello, received special recognition from conductor and audience for their labors.

It might have been better to remember Rachmaninoff by some other work than "The Island of the Dead." It has moments of impassioned sonority but it is not, all in all, an interesting piece, and it contains many plain reminderse of other composers. Dr. Koussevitzky was obviously working like mad to get something out of it, but the attempt was only moderately significant.

Mr. Copland's piece requires the aid of a speaking voice; it is a patchwork of Lincoln utterances sewed together by fairly unrelated biography and comment. A composer who undertakes to set Lincoln to music has not much else to do than to stand out of the way, because Lincoln's words are already orchestra and music. Mr. Copland puts forth a lively prologue aimed to evoke the turbulent atmosphere of Lincoln's presidential years and then subsides to an effective comment while the words are being said. Will Geer, who looks something like the pictures of the young Lincoln, did the speaking and did it admirably. During the prelude his pained frown of one getting into the mood to be Abraham Lincoln was distracting, but when he got up to speak he, like Mr. Copland, didn't try to polish the words, he just let them go, and they were very moving. Though they were first spoken 80 years ago, they are words for today and words for tomorrow, words for individuals as well as words for nations. Mr. Copland has done well to bring them forward again.

The evening ended with Sibelius's second symphony, in D major. It was, of course, done with brilliance and refinement, which are noble virtues in an orchestra. But a touch of frenzy helps out in affairs of this kind, and, I am glad to report, there was this touch in the finale. The gentlemen from Boston were bowing, blowing and beating with that estimably controlled abandon that Dr. Koussevitzky wisely saves into the last movement of the last piece of the season. It was fine.

Boston Symphony in New York

By Oscar Thompson

New York

With three American compositions on his final program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston Symphony in the last of the 10 concerts of its fifty-seventh season in New York.

All things considered, there need be no hesitation in saying that in these 10 concertas the orchestra maintained the highest level of playing that can be credited to any one of the four major symphonic bodies heard here in the 1942-43 music year, the others being the Philadelphia Orchestra, the NBC Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

The Philadelphians also have been heard but 10 times in Carnegie Hall—their usual number—but it is to be remembered that the NBC Symphony and the Philharmonic - Symphony have presented many more programs. When the last-named has completed its regular subscription schedule on April 18, its total, exclusive of the children's concerts and special programs, will have run to 98, involving always three and frequently four concerts a week.

The superiority of the Boston orchestra's playing has been primarily that of perfection of ensemble. Old arguments may persist as to the kind of tonal quality preferred by Dr. Koussevitzky, as compared to that sought and obtained by certain other conductors, notably Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski. But at the moment only the NBC Symphony is within challenging distance of the Bostonians as a polished and precisely integerated whole, and in the opinion of this writer there is still an appreciable gap to be bridged before either Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski can be said to have under his beat an instrument so finished and so tempered as that which serves Koussevitzky.

The Philadelphia ensemble is still a noteworthy one, but it has never played for Eugene Ormandy quite as sumptuously as it once played for Mr. Stokowski. The Philharmonic-Symphony indisputably has lost ground since its peak days under Mr. Toscanini, and is at the moment a battleground of reorganization, though its personnel undoubtedly is with a few exceptions of the highest caliber.

The Koussevitzky concerts in Carnegie Hall have been welcomed by the fastidious for the substance of their programs as well as for their adroitly knit and uncommonly eloquent performances. For New York, novelties at the hands of the Bostonians have included the Martinů First Symphony, the Harris Fifth, Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" and Schuman's "A Free Song"—all composed in this country and all but the first a native-born American. Each of these had qualities to justify the care lavished on their introduction, though critical reactions were various and not always flattering. Messrs. Harris, Copland and Schuman have much to thank Dr. Koussevitzky for, though whether—as is sometimes asserted by their less fortunate brethren—he has been the "making of them" is for time to show.

As in past seasons, Russian and French music has figured extensively on Dr. Koussevitzky's Carnegie Hall programs. There has been heavy emphasis on the symphonies of Shostakovitch, with performances of the Fifth, Sixth and Seventh of the series. The Fifth has had a persistent advocate in the Boston conductor, season after season, and his popular success with it would seem to vindicate, at least for the time being, his enthusiasm for a work that has had, at best, a spotty reception from the critical fraternity.

Mr. Toscanini's first presentation of the Seventh, a summer adventure with the NBC Symphony, has remained in the memory as the most exciting of several experiences with much-discussed opus, but possibly because the interest of its colossal first-movement crescendo was found to decline with each subsequent performance, including those that Mr. Toscanini himself gave in the second week of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season. The Sixth has attracted no such attention as either the Fifth or the Seventh. Even Dr. Koussevitzky's devoted performances have scarcely kindled a real interest such as would promise for it a continuing life with our audiences in America.

Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 21, which was among the Russian works played by the Bostonians in their visits to Manhattan, was a tour-de-force, as this orchestra achieved it, but the symphony might as well have been any other one of this composer's long array, so far as the after impression is concerned. One recalls the performance rather than the work. The little "Classical" of Prokofieff has been something of a specialty with the Boston conductor and is always welcomed when he brings it back. Its briskly pointed return this season was no exception. For Dr. Koussevitzky, there is always Tchaikovsky among the Russians as there is always the lonely Finn Sibelius; and of course Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms among the Germans and the Austrians.

One does not always agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's way of playing the romantics — his Schumann "Spring" Symphony this season was a marvel of technical expertness, but more than a little brittle in sound; everything was there but the "romantic aura." But when he turns to such music as the Vaughan Williams Fantasy on a Theme of Thomas Tallis and makes such splendor of its string sonorities as he did at one of the concerts recently past, all reservations are swept away. The finesse and the clarity, the style and the glow of his achievement of a French program that included Milhaud's "Le Cortège Funèbre," Debussy's "La Demoiselle Élue," and Ravel's "Schéhérazade" and second "Daphnis et Chloé" Suite were characteristically his own. And the surging, throbbing, impassioned playing of Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," given in memory of the great Russian composer, pianist, and conductor, was of a tragic appeal not often experienced in the abodes of symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 10 1943

MUSICAL EVENTS

Portraits and Essays

THE catalogue of music about Lincoln, which is no slender leaflet, has been enlarged by Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," composed at the suggestion of André Kostelanetz and introduced to Carnegie Hall last week by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony, and Will Geer. Mr. Copland's "Portrait" begins with an effective atmospheric section, designed to indicate something of Lincoln's personality; next, there is a bright episode in which "Camptown Races" and "Springfield Mountain" bounce about fetchingly. So far, so good—and very good, too. Then Mr. Copland turns the proceedings over to spoken quotations from Lincoln's writings, with music serving as background for these excerpts. There's nothing wrong with this part of Mr. Copland's music, but it is secondary to Lincoln's words, and the net result is something like a picture that hasn't been finished. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the skillfully written score with his customary brilliance and Mr. Geer intoned the lines in an accent that probably was intended to convey Lincoln's geographic background.

Originally, Mr. Copland had thought of devoting his portrait to Walt Whitman, but he was dissuaded by Mr. Kostelanetz. It just happened, however, that Whitman received musical attention at one of the concerts which offered the Lincoln portrait. The Whitman entry was "A Free Song," William Schuman's secular cantata to words adapted from Whitman poems. Mr. Schuman's familiar orchestral craftsmanship and sensitivity were apparent in this music, but somehow it didn't always make its points. Setting Whitman for chorus seems to be a troublesome venture; the experiment rarely has been a complete success. The chorus on this occasion was a combination of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which sang enthusiastically.

Mr. Koussevitzky also had on the program an American composition without speakers or singers—Private Samuel Barber's first "Essay for Orchestra," which had had its New York première by the N.B.C. Orchestra and Arturo Toscanini in November, 1938.

The "Essay" is communicative, attractive music that stands up well under repetition.

School Year of Four 12-\ Gets Approval of Board

April 10 1943

Photo by Kaganowich

PRESIDENT AND MRS. CLOTHIER congratulate Dr. Serge Koussevitsky after the concert Sunday afternoon in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled a capacity audience in the Gym. The occasion marked the ninth appearance on campus of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Capacity Audience Thrills To Boston Symphony Orchestra

A capacity audience of 3,100 music lovers was in attendance at the gymnasium last Sunday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave its ninth annual concert at Rutgers.

The concert consisted of familiar works by the composers Mozart, Debussy, Ravel, and Beethoven. The major work of the performance was Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, which was memorably performed by the orchestra.

Following the opening of the concert with the "Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Koussevitzky directed the audience in singing, the orchestra presented a fine rendition of Mozart's delicate Symphony No. 34 in C major, followed by a playing of Claude Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by a poem by Stephane Malarme, which will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it played. The predominance of woodwinds, blended with the passages of strings and thrilling brasses made this work as interpreted by the orchestra exceptionally brilliant.

As was to be expected, the Second "Daphnis et Cloe" Ballet Suite of Ravel, which was played immediately before the intermission, was given its usual excellent treatment, as in all past performances of this work, for which Dr. Koussevitzky is noted.

The concluding work on the program, the beloved 5th Symphony of Ludwig van Beethoven, was played in a manner which thrilled the audience, and brought out to its fullest the greatness of this classic. The assemblage sat enthralled throughout the symphony, inspired by the powerful opening movement, with its impressive four-note theme, by the more melodic second movement, and the moving third and fourth parts of the work.

A thunderous ovation of many minutes' duration poured forth from the delighted listeners at the conclusion of the playing, in fitting tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his fine group of musicians, and the conductor was compelled to return to the podium time after time, to receive the acclaim of the assemblage.

The enthusiastic comment which was heard as the audience left the auditorium was sufficient evidence of the appreciation felt each of those present, of the fineness of quality of the music which it had heard, and of the orchestra which presented it.

Chorus Heard With Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

For sheer beauty of sound, it seemed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpassed even itself in the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall, the twenty-second of the season. It is pretty certain that such sonority and such tone color could be heard nowhere else in the world today.

The orchestra and its conductor are playing an indispensable part in keeping the art of music in performance at its highest standard, and thus helping to preserve a culture without which victory in arms would be meaningless.

The first half of yesterday's program consisted of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G, for string orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata, "Christ Lag in Todesbanden"); Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss' "Don Juan."

In other words, a work which exhibited once more the glories of the string choirs, one which displayed the tonal variety of which the full orchestra is capable in a Romantic work, and one which revealed the splendors of the Straussian musical palette as envisioned by a burning conductorial imagination expressing itself through an incomparable ensemble.

Dr. Koussevitzky is the master of all three of these disparate styles. He secured splendid representations of the Bach and the Brahms; but the performance of the Strauss was unequalled in my experience, and it is doubtful if the work had ever been projected before with so much brilliance of tone, subtlety of shading, rhythmic vitality and expressional power. This tone poem is Strauss at his best, before the streak of vulgarity in his artistic nature had become too apparent, and the performance put it in its best light. After this amazing achievement, the Frdiay afternoon audience applauded politely, and recalled the conductor once.

The second half of the program was devoted to choral works, with the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, assisting. The works chosen were Brahms' "Ein Schicksalslied," Wolf's "Der Feuerreiter," and the Polovetzian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Not a particularly well assorted group.

The Brahms "Song of Destiny" was sung with a reasonably good balance and with appropriate seriousness. The theatrical Wolf piece was done with considerable warmth. But the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus could not quite realize the barbaric quality of Borodin.

[64]

Boston Symphony in New York

By Oscar Thompson

New York

With three American compositions on its final program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston Symphony in the last of the 10 concerts of its fifty-seventh season in New York.

All things considered, there need be no hesitation in saying that in these 10 concertas the orchestra maintained the highest level of playing that can be credited to any one of the four major symphonic bodies heard here in the 1942-43 music year, the others being the Philadelphia Orchestra, the NBC Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

The Philadelphians also have been heard but 10 times in Carnegie Hall—their usual number—but it is to be remembered that the NBC Symphony and the Philharmonic - Symphony have presented many more programs. When the last-named has completed its regular subscription schedule on April 18, its total, exclusive of the children's concerts and special programs, will have run to 98, involving always three and frequently four concerts a week.

The superiority of the Boston orchestra's playing has been primarily that of perfection of ensemble. Old arguments may persist as to the kind of tonal quality preferred by Dr. Koussevitzky, as compared to that sought and obtained by certain other conductors, notably Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski. But at the moment only the NBC Symphony is within challenging distance of the Bostonians as a polished and precisely integerated whole, and in the opinion of this writer there is still an appreciable gap to be bridged before either Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski can be said to have under his beat an instrument so finished and so tempered as that which serves Koussevitzky.

The Philadelphia ensemble is still a noteworthy one, but it has never played for Eugene Ormandy quite as sumptuously as it once played for Mr. Stokowski. The Philharmonic-Symphony indisputably has lost ground since its peak days under Mr. Toscanini, and is at the moment a battleground of reorganization, though its personnel undoubtedly is with a few exceptions of the highest caliber.

The Koussevitzky concerts in Carnegie Hall have been welcomed by the fastidious for the substance of their programs as well as for their adroitly knit and uncommonly eloquent performances. For New York, novelties at the hands of the Bostonians have included the Martinů First Symphony, the Harris Fifth, Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" and Schuman's "A Free Song"—all composed in this country and all but the first a native-born American. Each of these had qualities to justify the care lavished on their introduction, though critical reactions were various and not always flattering. Messrs. Harris, Copland and Schuman have much to thank Dr. Koussevitzky for, though whether—as is sometimes asserted by their less fortunate brethren—he has been the "making of them" is for time to show.

As in past seasons, Russian and French music has figured extensively on Dr. Koussevitzky's Carnegie Hall programs. There has been heavy emphasis on the symphonies of Shostakovitch, with performances of the Fifth, Sixth and Seventh of the series. The Fifth has had a persistent advocate in the Boston conductor, season after season, and his popular success with it would seem to vindicate, at least for the time being, his enthusiasm for a work that has had, at best, a spotty reception from the critical fraternity.

Mr. Toscanini's first presentation of the Seventh, a summer adventure with the NBC Symphony, has remained in the memory as the most exciting of several experiences with much-discussed opus, but possibly because the interest of its colossal first-movement crescendo was found to decline with each subsequent performance, including those that Mr. Toscanini himself gave in the second week of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season. The Sixth has attracted no such attention as either the Fifth or the Seventh. Even Dr. Koussevitzky's devoted performances have scarcely kindled a real interest such as would promise for it a continuing life with our audiences in America.

Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 21, which was among the Russian works played by the Bostonians in their visits to Manhattan, was a tour-de-force, as this orchestra achieved it, but the symphony might as well have been any other one of this composer's long array, so far as the after impression is concerned. One recalls the performance rather than the work. The little "Classical" of Prokofieff has been something of a specialty with the Boston conductor and is always welcomed when he brings it back. Its briskly pointed return this season was no exception. For Dr. Koussevitzky, there is always Tchaikovsky among the Russians as there is always the lonely Finn Sibelius; and of course Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms among the Germans and the Austrians.

One does not always agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's way of playing the romantics — his Schumann "Spring" Symphony this season was a marvel of technical expertness, but more than a little brittle in sound; everything was there but the "romantic aura." But when he turns to such music as the Vaughan Williams Fantasy on a Theme of Thomas Tallis and makes such splendor of its string sonorities as he did at one of the concerts recently past, all reservations are swept away. The finesse and the clarity, the style and the glow of his achievement of a French program that included Milhaud's "Le Cortège Funèbre," Debussy's "La Demoiselle élue," and Ravel's "Schéhérazade" and second "Daphnis et Chloé" Suite were characteristically his own. And the surging, throbbing, impassioned playing of Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," given in memory of the great Russian composer, pianist, and conductor, was of a tragic appeal not often experienced in the abodes of symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 10 1943

MUSICAL EVENTS

Portraits and Essays

THE catalogue of music about Lincoln, which is no slender leaflet, has been enlarged by Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," composed at the suggestion of André Kostelanetz and introduced to Carnegie Hall last week by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony, and Will Geer. Mr. Copland's "Portrait" begins with an effective atmospheric section, designed to indicate something of Lincoln's personality; next, there is a bright episode in which "Camptown Races" and "Springfield Mountain" bounce about fetchingly. So far, so good—and very good, too. Then Mr. Copland turns the proceedings over to spoken quotations from Lincoln's writings, with music serving as background for these excerpts. There's nothing wrong with this part of Mr. Copland's music, but it is secondary to Lincoln's words, and the net result is something like a picture that hasn't been finished. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the skillfully written score with his customary brilliance and Mr. Geer intoned the lines in an accent that probably was intended to convey Lincoln's geographic background.

Originally, Mr. Copland had thought of devoting his portrait to Walt Whitman, but he was dissuaded by Mr. Kostelanetz. It just happened, however, that Whitman received musical attention at one of the concerts which offered the Lincoln portrait. The Whitman entry was "A Free Song," William Schuman's secular cantata to words adapted from Whitman poems. Mr. Schuman's familiar orchestral craftsmanship and sensitivity were apparent in this music, but somehow it didn't always make its points. Setting Whitman for chorus seems to be a troublesome venture; the experiment rarely has been a complete success. The chorus on this occasion was a combination of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, which sang enthusiastically.

Mr. Koussevitzky also had on the program an American composition without speakers or singers—Private Samuel Barber's first "Essay for Orchestra," which had had its New York première by the N.B.C. Orchestra and Arturo Toscanini in November, 1938.

The "Essay" is communicative, attractive music that stands up well under repetition.

School Year of Four 12-\ Gets Approval of Board

April 9 1943
Rutgers University New Brunswick

Photo by Kaganowich

PRESIDENT AND MRS. CLOTHIER congratulate Dr. Serge Koussevitsky after the concert Sunday afternoon in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled a capacity audience in the Gym. The occasion marked the ninth appearance on campus of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Capacity Audience Thrills To Boston Symphony Orchestra

A capacity audience of 3,100 music lovers was in attendance at the gymnasium last Sunday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave its ninth annual concert at Rutgers.

The concert consisted of familiar works by the composers Mozart, Debussy, Ravel, and Beethoven. The major work of the performance was Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, which was memorably performed by the orchestra.

Following the opening of the concert with the "Star Spangled Banner," which Dr. Koussevitzky directed the audience in singing, the orchestra presented a fine rendition of Mozart's delicate Symphony No. 34 in C major, followed by a playing of Claude Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by a poem by Stephane Malarme, which will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it played. The predominance of woodwinds, blended with the passages of strings and thrilling brasses made this work as interpreted by the orchestra exceptionally brilliant.

As was to be expected, the Second "Daphnis et Cloe" Ballet Suite of Ravel, which was played immediately before the intermission, was given its usual excellent treatment, as in all past performances of this work, for which Dr. Koussevitzky is noted.

The concluding work on the program, the beloved 5th Symphony of Ludwig van Beethoven, was played in a manner which thrilled the audience, and brought out to its fullest the greatness of this classic. The assemblage sat enthralled throughout the symphony, inspired by the powerful opening movement, with its impressive four-note theme, by the more melodic second movement, and the moving third and fourth parts of the work.

A thunderous ovation of many minutes' duration poured forth from the delighted listeners at the conclusion of the playing, in fitting tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his fine group of musicians, and the conductor was compelled to return to the podium time after time, to receive the acclaim of the assemblage.

The enthusiastic comment which was heard as the audience left the auditorium was sufficient evidence of the appreciation felt each of those present, of the fineness of quality of the music which it had heard, and of the orchestra which presented it.

Chorus Heard With Symphony

April 17 1943

By L. A. Sloper

For sheer beauty of sound, it seemed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpassed even itself in the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall, the twenty-second of the season. It is pretty certain that such sonority and such tone color could be heard nowhere else in the world today.

The orchestra and its conductor are playing an indispensable part in keeping the art of music in performance at its highest standard, and thus helping to preserve a culture without which victory in arms would be meaningless.

The first half of yesterday's program consisted of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G, for string orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata, "Christ Lag in Todesbanden"); Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss' "Don Juan."

In other words, a work which exhibited once more the glories of the string choirs, one which displayed the tonal variety of which the full orchestra is capable in a Romantic work, and one which revealed the splendors of the Straussian musical palette as envisioned by a burning conductorial imagination expressing itself through an incomparable ensemble.

Dr. Koussevitzky is the master of all three of these disparate styles. He secured splendid representations of the Bach and the Brahms; but the performance of the Strauss was unequalled in my experience, and it is doubtful if the work had ever been projected before with so much brilliance of tone, subtlety of shading, rhythmic vitality and expressional power. This tone poem is Strauss at his best, before the streak of vulgarity in his artistic nature had become too apparent, and the performance put it in its best light. After this amazing achievement, the Frdiay afternoon audience applauded politely, and recalled the conductor once.

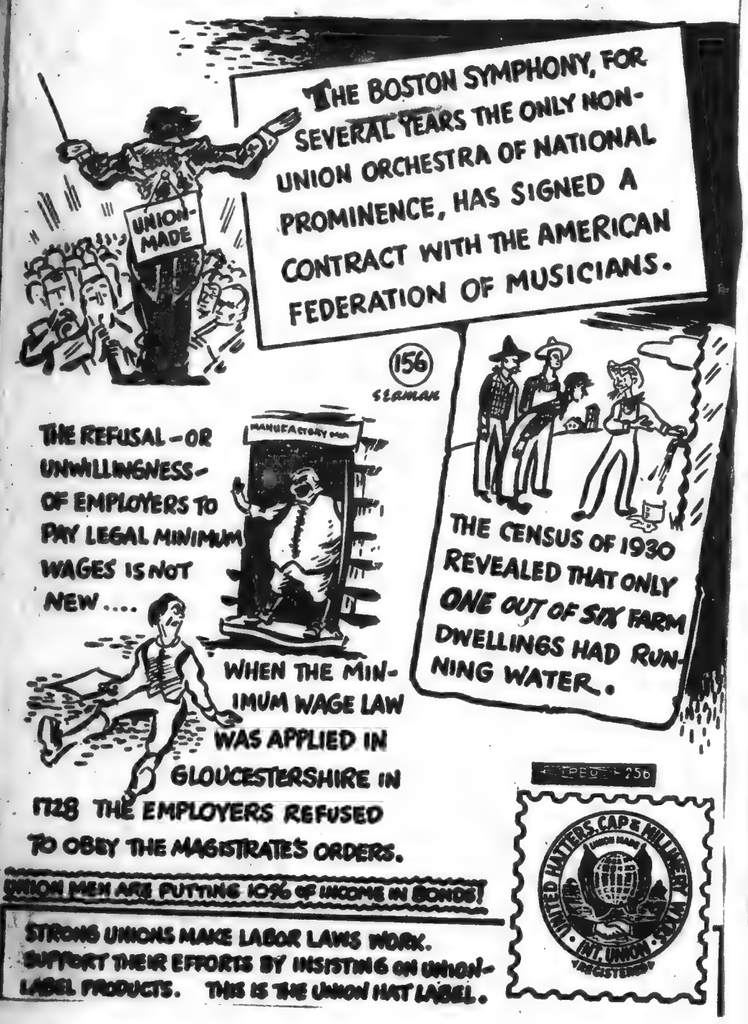
The second half of the program was devoted to choral works, with the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, assisting. The works chosen were Brahms' "Ein Schicksalslied," Wolf's "Der Feuerreiter," and the Polovetzian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Not a particularly well assorted group.

The Brahms "Song of Destiny" was sung with a reasonably good balance and with appropriate seriousness. The theatrical Wolf piece was done with considerable warmth. But the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus could not quite realize the barbaric quality of Borodin.

[64]

LABOR NEWS
SEATTLE, WASH
4/9/43

THE MARCH OF LABOR



This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
APR 11 1943

This Clipping From UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
APR 11 1943

Berkshire Center Closed This Year

Boston—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and directors of the organizations concerned, including the Boston Symphony, have decided not to renew the Berkshire Music Center this summer because of war conditions, including transportation.

However, it is only a suspension and plans are being made to reopen the center on the same scale as soon as war conditions permit.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," Dr. Koussevitzky said.

"But after this period of sacrifice, or deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages and the public as well will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, especially music."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, offered the sixth program of its supplementary series in Symphony Hall last night, presenting the following program:

Dubensky.....Prelude and Fugue
Debussy.....Prelude a "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune"
Ravel....."Daphnis and Chloe," 2d Suite
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

A catholic sort of program culminating inevitably in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony brought the Monday evening series of concerts to a close last night. There was a first performance of a Prelude and Fugue by Dubensky; there was Debussy's ever green "Afternoon of a Faun"; there was Ravel's extraordinary tour de force and there was Beethoven, and it is hard to see what more could be asked.

The Dubensky pieces came as something of a shock, and had not the composer walked out on the stage to receive one of the most cordial audience receptions of the season, it would have been hard to believe they had been written in this century.

This is not to say Mr. Dubensky thus falls into the category of dead contemporary compoosers, for although the music harks back to a bygone day in many ways, it is enlivened by a distinctly modern but subtly employed harmonic texture. So it seems to us the composer has blended the past and present as neatly as it has been done in some time.

Moreover, for all their brevity, the Prelude and Fugue have substance and point, which can hardly be said for most of the brief excursions contemporary composers make with their "essays" and what not. Until Mr. Dubensky came along, we'd come to think the only vehicle a contemporary American could ride was symphony with a good deal of instrumental fringe on top.

In short, Mr. Dubensky's Prelude made and well-sounding, are an admade and well-sounding, is one admirable addition to the repertoire. They were admirably played, too, as was everything else on the program. Dr. Koussevitzky's "Faun" seemed a bit too well-bred for our taste, but "Daphnis and Chloe" was as heady as ever, if not headier. The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 21st concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Emma Boynet, pianist, and Will Geer was narrator in Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The program was as follows:

Bach-Manglagalli .....Two Preludes
Mozart ..Concerto in E flat major (K. 271)
Copland .....'A Lincoln Portrait"
Rachmaninoff
Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27

It is to be questioned if any man ever got so eloquent a requiem as the late Sergei Rachmaninoff received yesterday afternoon at the hands of Serge Koussevitzky. Obviously, the orchestra played his second symphony as it never has before, but it cannot be denied that the man responsible, and wholly responsible, was Serge Koussevitzky.

It was an occasion filled with sentiment. Possibly there wasn't a person in the audience who had not seen and heard the late composer achieve one of his pianistic miracles on the same stage many times before, and some had doubtless seen and heard him conduct the same symphony with the same orchestra.

Yet the passing of Sergei Rachmaninoff heightens the extrinsic value of his music, for the time being in any case, and yesterday it was impossible to listen to the E minor symphony objectively. There was no sense in trying to. Next year or the year after is time enough to think about its faults, its reminiscence, its cloying lyricism; yesterday it was wonderful.

It mustn't be forgotten though, that it was wonderful because Serge Koussevitzky made it so. There is always a personal quality in his conducting, but yesterday the personal quotient was amazing. And well it might be for Koussevitzky and Rachmaninoff were more than countrymen, they were friends. So the second symphony stood head and shoulders above everything else on the program, and in many respects head and shoulders above anything else that has been done here this season. It was an extraordinarily touching, but yet not a maudlin, expression of the devotion of one great man for another.

The Bach Preludes went off well and so did the Mozart, but nothing more than well. Mlle. Boynet's performance had style but wanted somewhat in elan and vigor. Climaxing the first half of the program was a repetition of Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," the narration spoken as before by Will Geer. On second hearing the composition remains wholly effective and wholly good, as does Mr. Geer's calculatedly rough-hewn enunciation of the text. If there ever was a musical booby-trap, it is the writing of an illustrative biography in terms of music and the spoken word, and it must be said that Mr. Copland has proven himself by his handling of this particularly controversial subject, and has emerged a notch higher on the records as the leading contender as a "great American composer."

Next week the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) will assist the orchestra in choral works by Brahms, Wolf and Borodin, and the first half of the program will consist of Bach's 3d Brandenburg Concerto, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydr and Strauss's "Don Juan."

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
APR 17 1943

Radio Program Notes:

Koussevitsky To Conduct Bach, Brahms

Met to Broadcast Le Nozze di Figaro; Rep. Ploeser Address

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard in a program of traditional master works by Bach, Brahms and Richard Strauss in its regular weekly broadcast over the Blue Network Saturday (KGKO, 7:15 p.m.). Dr. Koussevitsky will open the program, which comes to listeners from Boston's Symphony Hall, with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G Major for string orchestra. Following this, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn will be played. To conclude the program, the orchestra will perform Richard Strauss' Don Juan, a stirring tone poem based upon the amorous escapades of the legendary character.

Tchaikovsky, Strauss And Rimsky Heard

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Schéhérazade," performed at the last of the Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Wheeler Beckett yesterday afternoon, was in the heyday of popularity at the time of World War I. Taken over by the Russian Ballet and made to serve as music for a dance drama of Arabian Nights background, it got exalted to a particularly high place in the show world and caught great hold on the American imagination. But it had no influence worth mentioning with the young folks of the period. It figured only in entertainment designed for the adult community.

Now, such is the progress of art, the "Schéhérazade" Suite goes for something that school pupils from the upper grades, and from those way down we won't say how far, listen to and accept with lively enthusiasm and complete understanding.

Matters like the "Eroica" and the "Choral" symphonies of Beethoven, because of their great length; elaborate tone poems, like those of Strauss; tedious constructions like the works of Bruckner and Mahler, and advanced exploits in sonority, like the pieces lately put out by Shostakovitch and Harris, are all that is left for the public of the Youth Concerts to catch up with.

Mr. Beckett indulged the fancy of his following at the closing of the series with a couple of examples of descriptive music, both Russian and high in color and exciting in incident. "Schéhérazade," of unmatched orchestral brilliance, was the first and Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812" was the second.

The difference between these pictorial studies and the usual symphony is somewhat that between the epic poetry of Vergil and the lyric of Horace. From a page of the "Aeneid" you have living persons in heroic action, whereas from an ode of Horace, if one happens to be included in the selections of your Latin reader, you get mostly form, rhythm, and rhetoric.

Happily, Mr. Beckett keeps the Strauss waltzes in the Youth repertory. They have a charm, finish, and delicacy when performed by the Boston Symphony men in serious concert style that puts them right in the classic array.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Arcady Dubensky, for many years a member of the first violin section of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, made his debut as composer with the Boston Symphony last evening. His Prelude and Fugue for full orchestra opened the sixth and final program of the "shorter" series of Boston Symphony concerts.

The remainder of Mr. Koussevitzky's rather conventional program offered Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite of orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and, after the interval, the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

So far as can be determined Mr. Dubensky's unpretentious and very pleasant Prelude and Fugue was written in 1932, a year which was evidently (according to several references) the beginning of a period during which he composed numerous works in this form for several orchestral and chamber combinations.

The Prelude and Fugue is in slow time; the first, an adagio which exploits the sonoroties of strings alone; the second, andante con moto for full orchestra. The work is couched in a romantic idiom and constructed of a counterpoint which properly belongs to the 19th Century, something quite different from the counterpoints of the Golden Age of Polyphony, the 16th Century, and of Bach's time. The composer was present to acknowledge cordial applause.

The gray and lavender water-color pastels of the Debussy were very beautifully painted. And the Ravel was a wonderful contrast of climaxes of irresistable force against whispering pianissimi. But neither had quite the glorious sheen and the perfection of detail which are customary with Boston Symphony performances.

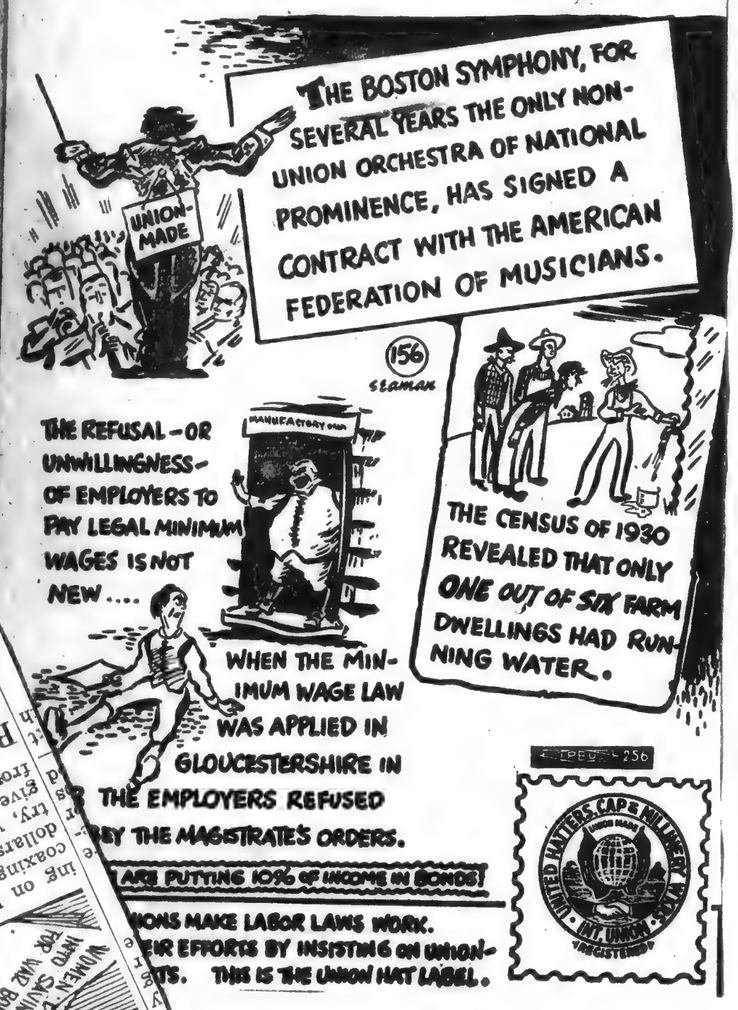
The Beethoven Symphony, on the other hand, was a tower of strength and power. It had spiritual vigor, but the proper balance was not there. The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.—J. W. R.

[65]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

LABOR NEWS
SEATTLE, WASH
4/9/43

THE MARCH OF LABOR



From
H.

Music Center

Boston — Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky and directors of the organidations concerned, including the Boston Symphony, have decided not to renew the Berkshire Music Center this Summer because of war conditions, including transportation.

However, it is only a suspension and plans are being made to reopen the center on the same scale as soon as war conditions permit.

"Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate task of the war effort, students of all ages and the public as well will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts, especially music."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, offered the sixth program of its supplementary series in Symphony Hall last night, presenting the following program:

Dubensky.....Prelude and Fugue
Debussy.....Prelude a "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune"
Ravel....."Daphnis and Chloe," 2d Suite
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

A catholic sort of program culminating inevitably in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony brought the Monday evening series of concerts to a close last night. There was a first performance of a Prelude and Fugue by Dubensky; there was Debussy's ever green "Afternoon of a Faun"; there was Ravel's extraordinary tour de force and there was Beethoven, and it is hard to see what more could be asked.

The Dubensky pieces came as something of a shock, and had not the composer walked out on the stage to receive one of the most cordial audience receptions of the season, it would have been hard to believe they had been written in this century.

This is not to say Mr. Dubensky thus falls into the category of dead contemporary compoosers, for although the music harks back to a bygone day in many ways, it is enlivened by a distinctly modern but subtly employed harmonic texture. So it seems to us the composer has blended the past and present as neatly as it has been done in some time.

Moreover, for all their brevity, the Prelude and Fugue have substance and point, which can hardly be said for most of the brief excursions contemporary composers make with their "essays" and what not. Until Mr. Dubensky came along, we'd come to think the only vehicle a contemporary American could ride was symphony with a good deal of instrumental fringe on top.

In short, Mr. Dubensky's Prelude made and well-sounding, are an admade and well-sounding, is one admirable addition to the repertoire. They were admirably played, too, as was everything else on the program. Dr. Koussevitzky's "Faun" seemed a bit too well-bred for our taste, but "Daphnis and Chloe" was as heady as ever, if not headier. The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

Herald Apr. 10

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 21st concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Emma Boynet, pianist, and Will Geer was narrator in Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The program was as follows:

Bach-Mangiagalli .....Two Preludes
Mozart ..Concerto in E flat major (K. 271)
Copland ....."A Lincoln Portrait"
Rachmaninoff
Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27

It is to be questioned if any man ever got so eloquent a requiem as the late Sergei Rachmaninoff received yesterday afternoon at the hands of Serge Koussevitzky. Obviously, the orchestra played his second symphony as it never has before, but it cannot be denied that the man responsible, and wholly responsible, was Serge Koussevitzky.

It was an occasion filled with sentiment. Possibly there wasn't a person in the audience who had not seen and heard the late composer achieve one of his pianistic miracles on the same stage many times before, and some had doubtless seen and heard him conduct the same symphony with the same orchestra.

Yet the passing of Sergei Rachmaninoff heightens the extrinsic value of his music, for the time being in any case, and yesterday it was impossible to listen to the E minor symphony objectively. There was no sense in trying to. Next year or the year after is time enough to think about its faults, its reminiscence, its cloying lyricism; yesterday it was wonderful.

It mustn't be forgotten though, that it was wonderful because Serge Koussevitzky made it so. There is always a personal quality in his conducting, but yesterday the personal quotient was amazing. And well it might be for Koussevitzky and Rachmaninoff were more than countrymen, they were friends. So the second symphony stood head and shoulders above everything else on the program, and in many respects head and shoulders above anything else that has been done here this season. It was an extraordinarily touching, but yet not a maudlin, expression of the devotion of one great man for another.

The Bach Preludes went off well and so did the Mozart, but nothing more than well. Mlle. Boynet's performance had style but wanted somewhat in elan and vigor. Climaxing the first half of the program was a repetition of Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," the narration spoken as before by Will Geer. On second hearing the composition remains wholly effective and wholly good, as does Mr. Geer's calculatedly rough-hewn enunciation of the text. If there ever was a musical booby-trap, it is the writing of an illustrative biography in terms of music and the spoken word, and it must be said that Mr. Copland has proven himself by his handling of this particularly controversial subject, and has emerged a notch higher on the records as the leading contender as a "great American composer."

Next week the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) will assist the orchestra in choral works by Brahms, Wolf and Borodin, and the first half of the program will consist of Bach's 3d Brandenburg Concerto, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydr and Strauss's "Don Juan."

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

APR 17 1943

Radio Program Notes:

Koussevitsky To Conduct Bach, Brahms

Met to Broadcast Le Nozze di Figaro; Rep. Ploeser Address

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard in a program of traditional master works by Bach, Brahms and Richard Strauss in its regular weekly broadcast over the Blue Network Saturday (KGKO, 7:15 p.m.). Dr. Koussevitsky will open the program, which comes to listeners from Boston's Symphony Hall, with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G Major for string orchestra. Following this, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn will be played. To conclude the program, the orchestra will perform Richard Strauss' Don Juan, a stirring tone poem based upon the amorous escapades of the legendary character.

Tchaikovsky, Strauss And Rimsky Heard

Herald Apr. 10

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Schéhérazade," performed at the last of the Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Wheeler Beckett yesterday afternoon, was in the heyday of popularity at the time of World War I. Taken over by the Russian Ballet and made to serve as music for a dance drama of Arabian Nights background, it got exalted to a particularly high place in the show world and caught great hold on the American imagination. But it had no influence worth mentioning with the young folks of the period. It figured only in entertainment designed for the adult community.

Now, such is the progress of art, the "Schéhérazade" Suite goes for something that school pupils from the upper grades, and from those way down we won't say how far, listen to and accept with lively enthusiasm and complete understanding.

Matters like the "Eroica" and the "Choral" symphonies of Beethoven, because of their great length; elaborate tone poems, like those of Strauss; tedious constructions like the works of Bruckner and Mahler, and advanced exploits in sonority, like the pieces lately put out by Shostakovitch and Harris, are all that is left for the public of the Youth Concerts to catch up with.

Mr. Beckett indulged the fancy of his following at the closing of the series with a couple of examples of descriptive music, both Russian and high in color and exciting in incident. "Schéhérazade," of unmatched orchestral brilliance, was the first and Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812" was the second.

The difference between these pictorial studies and the usual symphony is somewhat that between the epic poetry of Vergil and the lyric of Horace. From a page of the "Aeneid" you have living persons in heroic action, whereas from an ode of Horace, if one happens to be included in the selections of your Latin reader, you get mostly form, rhythm, and rhetoric.

Happily, Mr. Beckett keeps the Strauss waltzes in the Youth repertory. They have a charm, finish, and delicacy when performed by the Boston Symphony men in serious concert style that puts them right in the classic array.

MUSIC

Apr 17

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Arcady Dubensky, for many years a member of the first violin section of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, made his debut as composer with the Boston Symphony last evening. His Prelude and Fugue for full orchestra opened the sixth and final program of the "shorter" series of Boston Symphony concerts.

The remainder of Mr. Koussevitzky's rather conventional program offered Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite of orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and, after the interval, the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

So far as can be determined Mr. Dubensky's unpretentious and very pleasant Prelude and Fugue was written in 1932, a year which was evidently (according to several references) the beginning of a period during which he composed numerous works in this form for several orchestral and chamber combinations.

The Prelude and Fugue is in slow time; the first, an adagio which exploits the sonoroties of strings alone; the second, andante con moto for full orchestra. The work is couched in a romantic idiom and constructed of a counterpoint which properly belongs to the 19th Century, something quite different from the counterpoints of the Golden Age of Polyphony, the 16th Century, and of Bach's time. The composer was present to acknowledge cordial applause.

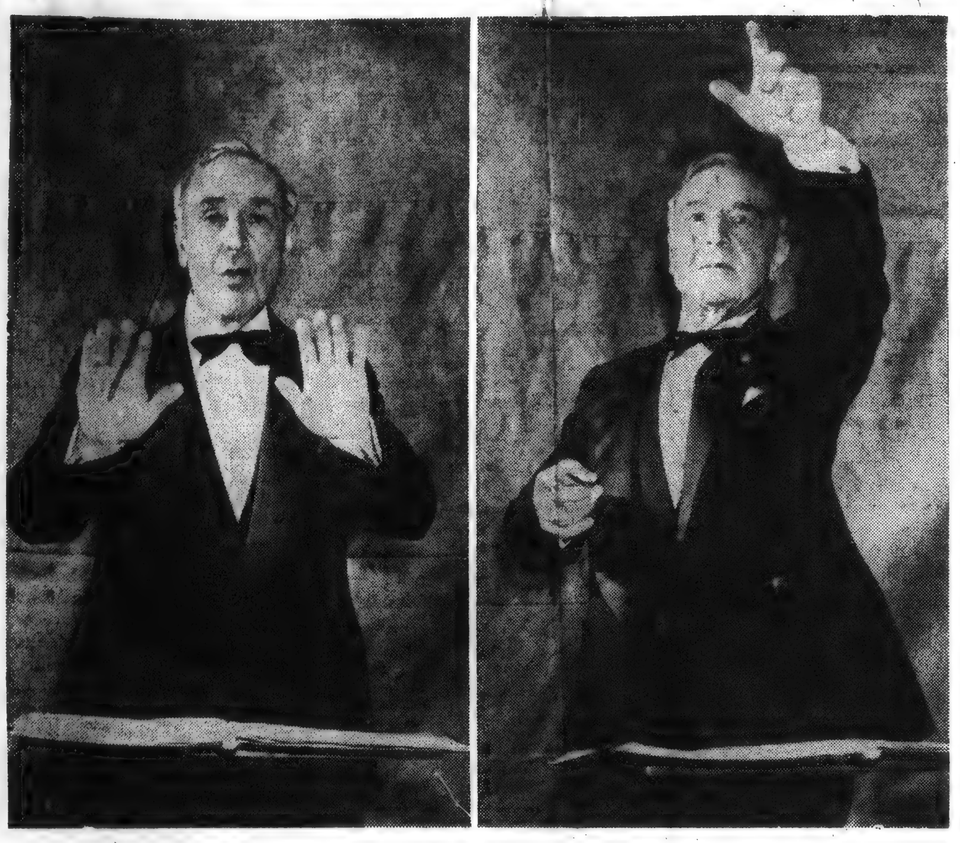
The gray and lavender water-color pastels of the Debussy were very beautifully painted. And the Ravel was a wonderful contrast of climaxes of irresistable force against whispering pianissimi. But neither had quite the glorious sheen and the perfection of detail which are customary with Boston Symphony performances.

The Beethoven Symphony, on the other hand, was a tower of strength and power. It had spiritual vigor, but the proper balance was not there. The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon.—J. W. R.

[65]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 18 1943

Koussevitzky's Volcanic Temperament Made Possible Multiple Accomplishments



By looking at any picture of himself conducting, Dr. Koussevitzky can tell what composition is being played—and here are several which he recognized as Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." He described them thusly: (Left), "This is undoubtedly the beginning of Ravel's 'Daphnes et Chloe'—the Second Suite. The sound of the orchestra must be heard coming softly and suddenly out of silence." (Right), "Culmination of a crescendo in 'Daphnis.'" (AP Photo.)

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, April 17 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage green room at Symphony Hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven fifth." He looked at other photographers and named scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony Hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Week after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky, conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has moulded the Boston Symphony.

A VOLCANIC temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony Hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs "fine, fine," and half-sits, half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over five feet six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers, impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you," he asks them. "So. If you want, we do it one thousand times."

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "If you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Serge Koussevitzky, world famous leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played. Here are four pictures of the 68-year-old Russian-born conductor which he readily recognized as the conducting of Sibelius' Second Symphony. He described them thusly: (Upper left), I want the trombones, forte"; (lower left), "crescendo in the symphony"; (upper right), "building up the climax in the last movement"; (lower right), "the chorale in the finale.' (AP Photo.)

KOUSSEVITZKY works as hard as the men. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: Ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. [illegible]-old in the little [illegible] Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

Indicative of the conductor's devotion to his art was his refusal to permit political differences to affect his musical tastes. Although a voluntary exile from Russia in 1920, he recently hailed the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Soviet Union during the Second World War.

"The greatest music of our day," he said, "is now being written in war-torn Russia. It carries a message of courage, comfort and faith amidst untold suffering and destruction."

KOUSSEVITZKY became an American citizen in 1941. Earlier honorary doctorates were awarded him by Brown University, in 1926, by Harvard, in 1929, by Yale, Rutgers, Rochester.

At the Brown ceremony the conductor felt that his English—then a mixture of Russian, French and German—would be inadequate to express his thanks. So, to show his appreciation, he played a solo on the double bass—and brought down the house. (As the university's president said afterward. "Dr. Koussevitzky has made the bull-fiddle sing like a nightingale.")

In his spare time Koussevitzky walks, reads philosophy and surprisingly enough, writes, because: "I like to spoil papers. That is my relaxation between concerts."

Among the conductor's most prized possessions are numerous letters from men in the armed forces. "These writings, sometimes they bring tears to my eyes," he says.

One, from Private Bernard Brown, a member of the U. S. Airforce stationed at Miami, Florida, told of listening to a broadcast while on duty in barracks.

"I only wish to say that I have never enjoyed a piece of classical music played by anyone, as I did your rendition," Brown wrote. "Accept my sincerest thanks for helping a soldier pass part of a pretty lonely night."

Cecilia Society, Apollo Club Aid in Brilliant Symphony

Herald Date 4/19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d program of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The choruses of the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, assisted in the following program:

Bach....Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ Lag in Todesbanden")
Brahms....Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56 a Strauss....."Don Juan," Op. 20
Brahms....."Ein Schicksallied," for Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 54
Wolf....."Der Feuerreiter" for Chorus and Orchestra
Borodin....Polovetsian Dances from "Prince Igor" for Chorus and Orchestra

Safely out of its mid-winter programmatic doldrums, the Symphony continued its long reach towards the finish line yesterday in an exciting program, excitingly performed from beginning to end. In point of fact, when it comes time to re-examine the season, yesterday's concert may well forge its way within hailing distance of the top.

The biggest surprise was the performance of the choruses of the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club. This is not to cast down their laurels hitherto gained, for they always sing the notes, but yesterday they made the notes mean something. They'd obviously been groomed for the occasion by Arthur Fiedler within a tone of their topmost C's, and they responded to Dr. Koussevitzky's subtlest gestures with exceptional fluency. Moreover, they achieved an unusual warmth of tone; there wasn't a moment of dryness or shrillness in the vocal production. If you couldn't have seen the choruses, you would have thought them composed of singers in the first flush of maturity, so rich and glowing was the tone.

The pieces they sung couldn't have been better chosen either for them or for us. The Brahms, a fine work although not up to the choral movements of the Requiem, was expressively done; the Wolf, a hair-raising ballad, was given with all the necessary verve, and the Borodin, a wonderful rabblerouser, brought the program to a brilliant close. Needless to say, the orchestra went through all this with its usual virtuosity, but it was nothing to what it accomplished in the opening half of the program.

The third Brandenburg Concerto, whose incredible, uncapturable forward motion has been driving modernists into imitative despair, could open every second Symphony concert so far as we are concerned, especially when it is played so miraculously by the string band. The Variations on "St. Anthony's Chorale," one of the best things Brahms ever did, were given the finest performance both instrumentally and interpretatively we have ever heard. Come to think of it, the same might well be said for Strauss's heady tone poem delineating the romantic ups and downs of Lenau's Don Juan. Possibly that particular hero didn't have quite as much romance in him as Dr. Koussevitzky made out for him in the long lyric section, but how could any character of fiction have such ardour, such emotional intensity as the good doctor himself? His was, in short, a conception of great vividness and drive coupled with the acme of romantic feeling. How it could have been more impressively conceived or performed we just do not know. Next week's program, consisting of compositions by Handel Schubert, Wagner, Jacobi, Ravel and Rimsky-Korsakov looks good, too. It will be given on Thursday afternoon and Saturday night.

[66]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

APR 19 1937

T. ADAMOWSKI, 86, BOSTON VIOLINIST

Soloist of Symphony Orchestra 22 Years, Long Conductor of 'Pops' Concerts, Dies

ORGANIZED OWN QUARTET

Also Toured Country With Trio He Formed—Taught at New England Conservatory

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 18—Timothée Adamowski, violin virtuoso and former first violinist and soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today in the Phillips House after a short illness. His age was 86.

Mr. Adamowski, who made his American debut here in 1879, later toured the country and in 1884 joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, remaining until 1907 except for a year, 1887, when he traveled in Europe.

In 1888 he formed the Adamowski Quartet, the other members of which were Emmanuel Fiedler, Daniel Kuntz and Giuseppe Campanari. For many years, starting in 1890, he was conductor of the "pop concerts" and was referred to by newspapers as the "Idol of the Pops."

Mr. Adamowski as violin soloist had appeared more than eighty times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also had played with the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, the Philharmonic in London, under Arthur Nikisch, and with the opera orchestra in Warsaw.

In 1896 he organized the Adamowski Trio, consisting of himself, his brother, Josef, as 'cellist, and the latter's wife, the former Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, a pupil of Paderewski. The trio toured the country, winning considerable acclaim.

Mr. Adamowski joined the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music in 1908 as a teacher of advanced classes in violin. He trained many students who have since achieved prominence as violinists and several of whom are now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He was born in Warsaw, Poland, exhibited at an early age a talent for music and when 7 years old began studying the violin. While at college he continued his musical studies and then entered the Conservatory of Music at Warsaw as a pupil of Apollinaire Kontski.

Mr. Adamowski made his first public appearance in 1872, when he played a solo at a conservatory concert. He served as first violinist with the conservatory orchestra, was graduated in 1874 with the highest honors and was engaged as solo violinist by the Musical Society of Warsaw.

He married in 1903 at Narragansett, R. I., Miss Gertrude Lewis Pancoast of Philadelphia, who survives.

Wald Norma Bertolami

Soloist with the Pops Orchestra in Rimsky-Korsakoff's Piano Concerto, Radcliffe Night, May 5.

GOOD CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

Appropriate Programme for Easter

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony programme which, because of Good Friday, had its first hearing yesterday afternoon, has an appropriately churchly flavor. It is also one of the longest on record. Of the six pieces which make it, three are religious in character, namely, Wagner's "Parsifal" Prelude, Frederick Jacobi's "Ode" for Orchestra, heard here for the first time, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Russian Easter."

Through an association of ideas Handel's Organ Concerto, No. 10, in which E. Power Biggs is the soloist, fits perfectly into the above picture and since the harp had once a hieratic function, one might almost extend the same privilege to Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for that instrument, with light orchestral accompaniment, that features Bernard Zighera, like Mr. Biggs an orchestra member, as the solo player. That leaves only the second number, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, completely out in the secular cold and Dr. Koussevitzky's extremely slow and solemn pacing of the second movement virtually lifted at least that division into the sacred class.

As the novelty of the afternoon Mr. Jacobi's "Ode" deserves the first detailed mention, but there is not a great deal that may be said about it. Its inspiration was a prayer in the Jewish liturgy and it had its first performance in San Francisco last February. In this piece, at least, Mr. Jabocci makes no effort to write in what is loosely called the modern manner. There are several influences at work in his not too individual score, but none of them is exactly contemporaneous. One might almost hear the voice of Ravel, who follows him on the programme, and of d'Indy. Smooth and sonorous, with a church-chimes climax, anticipating that in the Overture of Rimsky, the "Ode" plainly won favor with the audience and when the composer was brought to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, the applause returned him thither several times.

Much of the organ part of Handel's Concerto seems disappointingly thin in texture, which was not the fault of the excellent Mr. Biggs. For the most part it is solid and sturdy Handel, while the orchestral prelude to the first Adagio is singularly impressive.

The Ravel piece had gone unheard at these concerts since 1931 and Rimsky's Overture since '36. Replete with displayful possibilities for the harp, of which Mr. Zighera made the most, it is hardly one of its composer's more distinguished utterances. The "Russian Easter" has a flavor all its own and even at the end of yesterday's lengthy programme it was good to hear. Good to hear, too, was the "Parsifal" Prelude though the so-called "Good Friday Spell" makes a better concert number. The "Unfinished" Symphony is, of course, one of music's rarest treasures. However, it would be nice to hear for a change one of its earlier and lesser predecessors. There are arguments against as well as for Dr. Koussevitzky's predilection for masterpieces

Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave its 96th Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program offered Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 (Op. 72) and the Symphony No. 9 in D minor (Op. 125). The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor and Julius Huehn, bass. The orchestra and soloists were assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

It is hardly possible to conceive of a more stunning performance of Beethoven's Ninth than Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra, soloists and chorus gave yesterday afternoon. It was not short of stupendous in conception and little short of stupendous in execution.

We thought the same last year, and if Dr. Koussevitzky chooses to do it again next year, we'll think the same thing. It's just local pride or provincialism or maybe plain stubbornness, but we can't bring ourselves to believe that any other conductor, orchestra or chorus can recreate this incredible masterpiece with such devastating cumulative effect.

Not forgetting the role or the musicianship of the performers, instrumental and vocal, the responsibility for so extraordinary an effect lies squarely upon the conductor's shoulders. It is difficult to say where any virtuoso conductor's showmanship leaves off and his musical conviction begins, but with Dr. Koussevitzky and the Ninth, the conviction unquestionably begins at the opening bar.

It is also difficult to capture the precise nature of the catalystic role he assumes in such a performance. It is more than mere conviction, obviously, for there have been many sincere bunglers, and it is more than mere technical proficiency, for there are hordes of time beaters. What it is that Dr. Koussevitzky brings with him to the stand is a lifetime spent in the painful assimilation of musical insight, of style, of understanding of the creative forces which brought so great a work as the Ninth into being. That there are those who could question a tempo here or a dynamic distortion there makes no difference whatever; those who heard the Ninth yesterday heard it in the ultimate conception of a very great man.

Naturally, it bespeaks a formidable force of executants to make this conception a reality. The orchestra's part was by all odds the most astonishing, the traversal by the violins, for instance, of the long phrase in triplets of the third variation of the adagio being of unparalleled beauty. The choral finale is effective even when it isn't well sung, but the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained to a fine edge by Mr. Woodworth, sang it exceedingly well. It is the soloists who have the ungrateful parts to sing, but the quartet comprising Zina Lisichkina, Anna Kaskas, Kurt Baum and Julius Huehn acquitted itself notably well. The performers were given an ovation, and Dr. Koussevitzky's final appearance on the stand brought cheers.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 23d concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were E. Power Biggs, organ, and Bernard Zighera, harp. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D minor, for Organ and Orchestra ..... Handel
Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") ..... Schubert
Prelude to "Parsifal" ..... Wagner
"Ode" for Orchestra ..... Jacobi
Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra ..... Ravel
"The Russian Easter," Op. 30 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

A programmatic bouillabaisse evidently designed to clean up various commitments gave the penultimate concert of the Symphony a sort of victory dinner aspect yesterday, and it can't be said to have provided one of the memorable affairs of the year. It wasn't terribly well played, either, although there were two solo performances of considerable distinction.

It did supply, however, an opportunity to hear side by side two of the most oddly contrasted pieces of "Easter" music possible to select. The first was the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," a composition that creaks with a pseudo-religious aura, and the second was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," a composition that groans with pseudo-religious bombast.

They're on opposite sides of the fence, those two pieces, but both have in common a complete failure in the realization of any truly devotional flavor whatever. There is more religion in four bars of the St. Matthew Passion, or in four pages of almost any hymn book you want to choose than in the whole half-hour we heard yesterday, and that for the simple reason that the authors of that half-hour of music were obviously, even painfully, self-conscious they were writing religious music. Wagner, as is well known, was especially eager in "Parsifal" to convince his enemies that he was as good a Christian as anyone else. True, he wrote some wonderful music in "Parsifal" (although the Prelude is by no means the best of it), but it is faulty to impute religious purity in its pious framework. Rimsky, on the other hand, was sincere enough in his motive in writing "Russian Easter," but he was too much the showman in his orchestration to hold himself in check. Thus the piece today is merely a lesser tour de force on liturgical themes. The Easter season, in short, was not any to satisfactorily recognized, except by implication.

E. Power Biggs, whose exceptional talents as an organist have long been recognized, performed the solo part of Handel's Concerto very capably, while the string band never sounded much better. The Schubert was given a good performance, although Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of it was strangely restrained and his tempos certainly slower than we've ever heard, while Ravel's enchanting Introduction and Allegro with Bernard Zighera performing the solo part magnificently, achieved the best impression of the entire concert.

Jacobi's "Ode," receiving its first performance here, was harmless enough and was, in fact, rather attractive, if smelling here and there of the lamp. It seemed to need supporting movements, and gave you the impression of having been lifted out of its context. The composer was in the audience and was cordially received. Generally speaking, the performance of the concert was not up to the usual standard, but then, that standard is so formidable we've all been badly spoiled.

The season comes to an end next week, the program offering Liadov's "From the Apocalypse," Brahms' Symphony No. 4 and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual concert in aid of its pension fund, given at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was devoted to Beethoven of the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and the Ninth Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass-baritone. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

An especial occasion like a pension fund concert is just the right time for a performance of Beethoven's huge and difficult Ninth Symphony. And no finer preface to the Symphony could be chosen than the "Leonore" No. 3. The Symphony is one of the great and visionary masterpieces in all music; the Overture contains the drama and pathos and final triumph of justice which is "Fidelio," the opera for which the Overture was written.

All in all, both Overture and Symphony were superbly done yesterday. Perhaps the Ninth was not quite so sheerly thrilling, so incandescent as it had been at that transcendant performance at the pension fund concert of a year ago. Perhaps the "Leonore" No. 3 has on other occasions been more gripping. Yet each work, yesterday, had a cumulative tension.

Mr. Koussevitzky took much of the slow movement of the Ninth a little faster than he used to do, if memory is correct, which did not disturb either the mood or the sustained motion of the music. The first movement was clear and majestic, the scherzo muscular and very fleet. Cellos and double-basses gave a fine account of that recitative at the outset of the finale, passages which must be phrased and timed exactly, else they lose their vitality. And the whole afternoon through, the orchestral tone was magnificent, even on a humid day that must have hampered stringed instruments and tympani.

Apart from Mr. Baum, who was singing for the first time in Boston, the soloists were those of last year's Ninth Symphony. The tenor part of this work is just as difficult, just as "ungrateful" as the other three vocal solos. Mr. Baum made a good deal of it with his strong and resonant, if somewhat constricted voice. Miss Lisichkina and Miss Kaskas again created a favorable impression, and Mr. Huehn, though he has been heard here in better voice, contributed musicianly singing.

Such exacting and massive music as Beethoven here wrote for chorus is hard under any circumstances, and notably so for young, immature voices. Thus a performance of the general caliber of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses yesterday speaks well for their efforts and the direction of Mr. Woodworth.

All concerned received a genuine ovation at the end of the concert, with stamping and "bravos" swelling the applause.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

APR 25 1943

Music Notes

By ROBERT B. COCHRANE

ON Tuesday afternoon of this week some 600 Baltimore men and women will begin to try the cultural temper of our time and our town.

More specifically, they will for the first time ask public support for the new Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, and they have set a goal of $150,000, which is intended to cover any deficits for the next two seasons of orchestral operation, assure continued engagement of ninety-five front-rank musicians, and underwrite twenty weeks of rehearsal and concert-giving for each of the next two seasons.

None Pays Its Way

No symphony orchestra, of course, pays its way. Neither, for that matter, does any library or art gallery, and neither do many of our best educational institutions and hospitals. But when any Baltimorean begins to tell outlanders of our civic assets, if he is at all articulate he is likely to number the Baltimore Symphony pretty early in his list.

This city probably supports more orchestral music by steady patronage than any other community of comparable size in the nation. There were more than forty symphonic programs at the Lyric this season, twenty-six by the Baltimore Symphony, seven by the Philadelphia, and close to a dozen by the National Symphony.

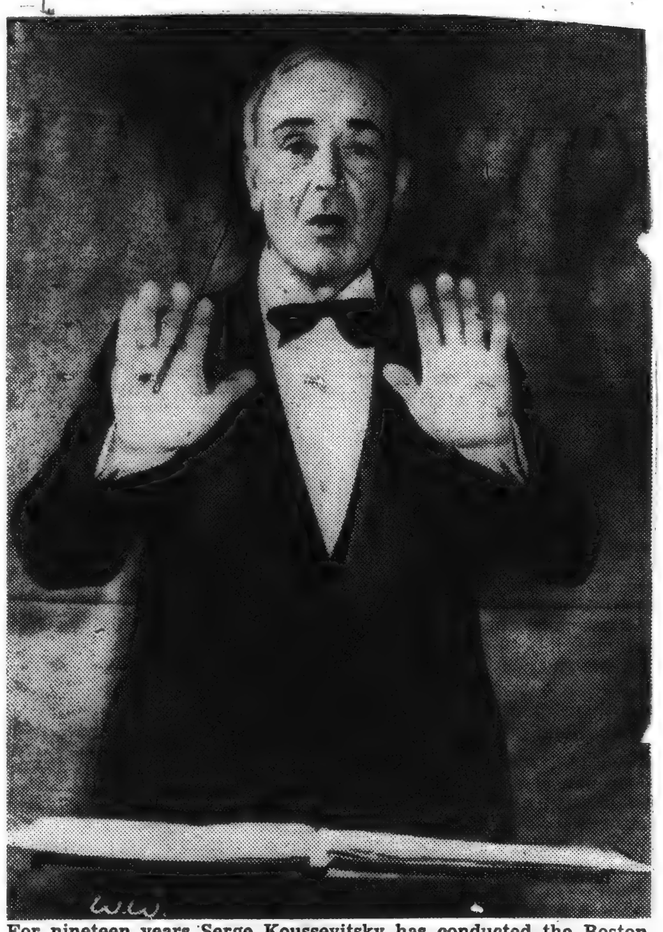
But in respect to the visiting orchestras it must be said Baltimore enjoys the fruits of similar fund-raising in other cities. In Washington, for instance, there is an annual campaign for public subscriptions of upward of $100,000. This applies to the orchestra's operating deficit no matter where incurred, and the Baltimore concerts certainly operate under the fund's protection.

An Idea To Advance

While the money is the important thing right now—for without it the orchestra may be seriously handicapped—the chief by-product of this campaign is hoped to be a realization by those who are approached and who contribute that this orchestra is something indigenous to Baltimore, that it is a part of the town like the Community Fund or the Battle Monument.

There is no getting around the fact that an orchestra is expensive. Any group of men with skills developed through experience ranging from five to forty years would be expensive to maintain. But its benefits are great, also. There is a renaissance of music in the making—witness the fact that today America has about 400 symphony orchestras, large and small. Some cities have become discouraged and dropped out of the musical parade—for example, Detroit, which abandoned its symphony last fall—but literally hundreds of orchestras have been born and have grown through depression years of the last decade and stand as testimonals to the determination of American music lovers to provide themselves with adequate and well-balanced musical recreation.

The Baltimore Symphony itself is a manifestation of this urge. The old Baltimore Symphony had died in unquiet confusion last season. The summer passed and nothing much was thought or done, but with the approach of the music season last fall it seemed that dozens of Baltimoreans were galvanized simultaneously into action and a season that outdid anything ever previously provided by the orchestra was hastily arranged.



For nineteen years Serge Koussevitsky has conducted the Boston Symphony. When he looked at this picture, taken at a concert without his knowledge, he said: "That is undoubtedly the beginning of Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe'—the Second Suite." And he was right

For Better Soloists

With less haste necessary and more deliberate preparations possible, the coming season's schedule should dwarf the first year's efforts. Last year's soloists were generally fine, but this year's should be better. Some of the first ones may be brought back—notably Miss Eleanor Steber, the young Metropolitan Opero soprano whose personable appearance and unquestionably superior musicianship instantly endeared her to the orchestra, and you can't fool orchestra players on real musicianship.

Another consideration at hand in regard to the orchestra is the matter of the purely orchestral Sunday night concerts. These were extremely successful last season, either because of the movie-level prices or other factors, and so they will be extended next fall.

Reginald Stewart, the conductor, and C. C. Cappel, the manager, are keen to diagnose the trend of public wishes in regard to orchestral matters, and this change is dictated by the apparent wishes of their patrons.

Giving Them More Rope

With an ample sustaining fund to rely upon, they can, of course, obtain better soloists and better regular players. They can dare a little and anticipate their public's wishes, whereas last season they had to be cautious.

The raising of this fund is a case of "many a mickle makes a muckle." The 600 solicitors, under team captains and majors, are going to contact as many Baltimoreans as possible during the eleven-day campaign. Obviously they won't be able to get to nearly all.

If it were possible that each of Baltimore's 1,000,000 residents could give 15 cents for the purpose the fund would be in hand at once. That is manifestly impossible.

But there are many thousands who know the Baltimore Symphony, who know the beneficent influence of the great music it recreates, and who can make some contribution toward its continuance. It is these who will be sought on Tuesday and in the next two weeks.

Beethoven's Ninth Under Koussevitzky

C.S.M. Apr 26

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its annual Pension Fund Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The main item of the program was again Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which was offered at the Pension Fund Concert a year ago. On this occasion the orchestra was assisted once more by the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, and by Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass.

The symphony was preceded by the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture, which received the customary highly dramatized reading at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands, and the usual brilliant performance by the orchestra. The dynamic range, which seemed if anything wider than usual, produced an overwhelming effect.

The three orchestral movements of the symphony, which to some of us remain its most attractive pages, were voiced with extraordinary eloquence. The Finale profited by the freshness and vigor of the choral singing as well as by the expertness of the orchestral contribution.

In this movement the conductor's predilection for dynamic extravagances was again conspicuous, especially in the statement of the principal theme by the lower strings pianissimo. This method unquestionably makes it possible to build up to a powerful climax, but at some cost of purely musical values.

Of the soloists, Mr. Baum was new to Symphony Hall. He revealed a tenor voice of pleasing qaulity, and well produced. Mr. Huehn, though he was not in his best voice, and though he seemed to have difficulty at times in keeping up with the pace maker, sang with his usual musical intelligence. The ladies performed their lesser roles satisfactorily.

The audience, which filled the hall, lingered at the end to give an ovation to conductor and performers.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 31 1943

Koussevitzky Plans Final Tribute To Rachmaninoff in Concert Here

Conductor of Boston Symphony Announces Alteration in Program to Include "Isle of the Dead"; Calls Late Musician "Master of Towering Stature"

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced last night he has altered the program he is to give in Providence next Tuesday evening, in memory of his friend and early colleague, Sergei V. Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist, conductor and composer, who died in Beverly Hills, Cal., Sunday.

The Boston Symphony will play Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "Isle of the Dead," here as a tribute to its composer. Programs being given in New York and Boston during the next week by the Boston Symphony also are being altered to include Rachmaninoff compositions.

In a tribute to Rachmaninoff last night in Boston, Koussevitzky described him as a man to whom "death came as a delivery from the nightmare into which the present war has thrown the world."

Rachmaninoff came to the United States in 1909 and played with the Boston orchestra. He and Koussevitzky were close associates. The Boston conductor-composer issued the following statement in tribute to the dead musician:

"Sergei Rachmaninoff is dead. The sorrowful news reaches the world. Its reality opens up a profound emptiness—an emptiness that can not be filled.

"The world of music mourns a master of towering stature, who was a symbol of dignity, integrity and inmost conscience in music. Indeed he will be thus remembered.

"Admired and esteemed as he was throughout the world, he remained unassuming, reserved, outwardly detached yet inwardly aching for suffering humanity. Only those who were close to him know the full measure of his tender devotion.

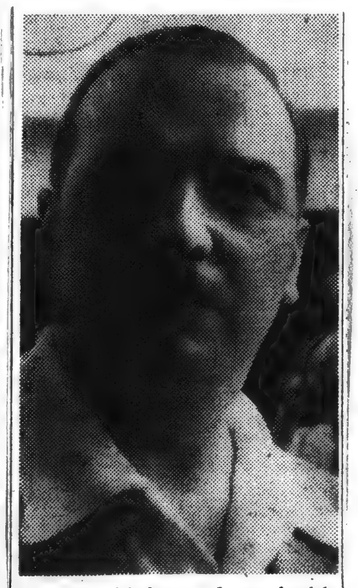
"These last years of world cataclysm weighed heavily upon him so sensitive and great was his heart.

"To him, death came as a delivery from the nightmare into which the present war has thrown the world.

"To us, the loss is even greater to bear because today of all times one like Sergei Rachmaninoff—an artist of his unique genius and his profound conscience — can not be spared."

Bernhard Weiser, pianist, who will be the soloist at the Pops concert next Saturday night. Mr. Weiser will play Grieg's piano concerto in A minor.

Olivia Hall, who will be soloist in Handel's Organ Concerto with the Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Thursday night.



Georges Moleux, first double bass of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will play Koussevitsky's Concerto for bass and Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday evening.

Music Lovers Schedule More Luncheon Recitals

Extra Events Set for May 7 and 14; Prominent Bostonians Attend Finale

By ALISON ARNOLD

Realizing that many changes will have taken place in the world by next fall when they gather in Symphony Hall, subscribers to the Friday afternoon concerts were particularly appreciative yesterday of the last program of the season. On this occasion their beloved conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented Liadov's "From the Apocalypse," Brahms' 4th Symphony, and Shostakovitch's Fifth. And those music lovers who have been attending the Symphony Luncheons, inaugurated this year, made plans to prolong the season with two extra recitals scheduled by Boris Goldovsky for 1 o'clock May 7 and May 14 at the Copley Plaza.

In the enthusiastic audience yesterday were Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis, Jr., the latter a sister of Gov. Saltonstall. Also enjoying the concert which ended the 62d season were Mrs. Channing H. Cox and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, both wives of former governors. Others whose names long have been associated with Boston's cultural development were Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. S. Huntington Wolcott and Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr.

Ever since the publication of her husband's book about gardening on 20 minutes a day, Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage, Jr., herself a successful herb-gardener, has been besieged by questions from novice friends. Yesterday, chatting with many during the intermission, she looked very slim in a gray suit and a veiled hat. Mrs. George Putnam who does her bit for the war effort through training Dogs for Defense, also attended the Symphony, and with Mrs. Hugh Bancroft was her daughter, Mrs. Ernest E. Decker, Jr., who devotes so much time to the Children's Hospital, as does Mrs. Edward Wendell, who took a few minutes off yesterday for the concert.

White hats were worn by the majority of those who braved the rain in spring costumes, and calots were the most popular. Mrs. Robert W. Emmons wore a calot of white pique with her dark suit as she chatted during intermission with Mrs. W. Arthur Dupee, Jr., and Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr.

The small white hat which Mrs. Edward B. Simmons wore with her gray frock, with frilly white collars and cuffs, was trimmed with narrow black bows. She was a guest of Mrs. Sheldon E. Wardwell, who also entertained Miss Eleanor Dewey and Mrs. Lawrence L. Reeve at the Symphony Luncheon before the concert.

At another table was Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson with her sister, Mrs. Richard W. Lyman, who wore a bow tie with her suit and postillion hat. Mrs. Robert Cram was with Mrs. Parker Converse. Others noted in the Copley's Oval Room were Mrs. Willard Everett, and Mrs. Edward Grew, Jr.

Miss Mary Amory, who will become a post-debutante tonight, was among the many young Symphony-goers who also included Miss Hilda Ayer, Miss Betsey Rimmer, Miss Louise Sargent, Miss Barbara Phippen, Miss Jean Clark and Miss Priscilla Thorndike. Mrs. George Saltonstall West was chatting with Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French and others glimpsed were Mrs. Robert Stevenson, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. George Megrew and her daughter, Miss Jane Megrew, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart and her daughter, Mrs. C. Stewart Black, Mrs. John T. Bottomley and Mrs. Harris J. Nelson.

SYMPHONY HAS NOTABLE FINAL

Shostakovitch's Fifth Gets Place of Honor

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is Dr. Koussevitzky's belief that the piece which actually ends a Boston Symphony season should be something pretty special, a climax that is a real climax. His favorite choice for this purpose has long been the First Symphony of Brahms, with Tchaikovsky's Fifth running it a poor second. Yesterday afternoon and this evening, however, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony occupied, and will occupy, this place of honor and it fills it very well indeed.

Brahms is also on hand this week but in the Fourth Symphony, not the First, and its place is before the intermission, with Liadov's Symphonic Picture, "From the Apocalypse," to precede it. It is these two works that the radio audience will hear tonight and, in this reviewer's humble opinion, it will miss much the best part of the show.

Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky thinks highly of "The Apocalypse." The present performances are the fourth at Symphony Hall. One cannot deny the piece a certain effectiveness but it can also be summarized as a blend of Liszt and Gounod in their more pompous moments, with a considerable infusion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." At least it served to display certain tonal virtues of the orchestra that neither of the symphonies call for. Shostakovitch's brilliance, when he chooses to be brilliant, is of another sort.

It is the fashion to call Brahms' Fourth Symphony autumnal and the characterization is an apt one. On a bright spring day it might almost have appeared out of place. As it was, the Symphony and the weather seemed made for each other. Dr. Koussevitzky prefers to read it in an heroic, occasionally tempestuous fashion and by his vigorous treatment of it yesterday aroused a great deal of applause.

There was even more to do over the Shostakovitch, which has a really exciting finish and one that does not altogether escape a touch of banality. The composer might have spared us that over-worked "How Dry I Am" sequence at the beginning of the coda. But the Symphony as a whole stands up well and seems to be Shostakovitch's masterpiece to date. This gifted Russian can invent salient symphonic themes and very often these ideas compare favorably with those of his great predecessors. Nor does it appear now that any of his active contemporaries really share that valuable gift. If he has not disdained popular appeal, he has also achieved power and beauty and in present-day music these two commodities are not exactly a drug on the market. Dr. Koussevitzky has faith

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S PLAN TO SUBSIDIZE U. S. COMPOSERS

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN THE old days a composer often found employment in some noble or royal household. This post of Kapellmeister was not calculated to increase his self-respect, since his status was that of an upper servant, but his material wants were provided and he had ample opportunity for creative work. Indeed, that was the principal part of his job. The outcome was not always as fortunate as it was in the case of Haydn and the Esterhazy family and seldom so unfortunate as in that of Mozart and the Prince Archbishops of Salzburg. With the passing of this system the composer's social position improved but in other respects he was not always so well off.

If Mozart had taken up the offer of the King of Prussia he probably would not have died at 35 and he certainly would not have been laid to rest in a pauper's grave. The appointment that Schubert didn't get would have prolonged his life also and the world would have been much the richer. It is appalling to think of how much of Wagner's energy was expended in the mere effort to get along. We are not too happy over the dreary round of piano lessons that Franck was forced to administer, and for a wretched compensation. Mahler brought on his death at 51 trying to make enough money by conducting to enable him to retire and find some time other than his summer vacations for composition, and MacDowell might not have cracked up as he did if he could have been spared the teaching at Columbia that he found so distasteful. These are but a few instances out of many but they are typical and they point to a state of affairs that is far from ideal.

* * * *

There have been cases of composers who were sustained by private munificence for a longer or shorter period, such as that of Beethoven and his three Viennese nobles or of Tchaikovsky and Mme von Meck. There have also been instances of government pensions like that which Sibelius has so long enjoyed from Finland. There have even been composers (outside the popular field), who made money at it, for example, Verdi, Brahms and Puccini. Strauss has made money, too, but conducting has taken up a lot of his time and Rachmaninoff, a successful musician, might be alive today if he could have afforded to abandon his concert tours and stick to composing, which was the thing he really wanted to do.

To come right down to the present we hear that certain European composers now residing in this country are having a hard time of it, while many of their fellows are able to subsist only by means of a teaching position in some school or college. It is, of course, the old issue of supply and demand. If what you have to sell is something the public does not want to buy in sufficient quantity, that is your hard luck. The publication of symphonic music is expensive and the copying of it by hand, ditto. And how many pieces get into the repertory and stay there?

* * * *

Most people would say that unless a paternalistic government takes matters in hand—something of the sort does go on in Russia—the composer must remain the victim of his gifts and ambitions. But Boston's Serge Koussevitzky believes that he has found a solution. In a recent letter to the New York Times he makes the suggestion that if every performing musician in the country were to contribute $1 annually the amount raised would be sufficient to keep many composers creating and incidentally supply these same musicians with worthwhile music to perform. Other groups, he said, might co-operate and thus swell the total. That there would be difficulties of administration the conductor freely admitted but he was confident that such details could be worked out. Obviously, however, all the deserving composers in the country could not be provided for—there are more of them than you might imagine—and the choosing of the recipients of this bounty, not to mention the choosing of the choosers, would still be a very ticklish job.

In other words, who would get the assistance, the budding genius or the man who has already made his name and reputation? How many similarly appointed judges would have gone out of their way to save Schubert's life? After all, the detection of talent is not always easy. There probably have been many more false alarms than blighted geniuses.

So far as administration goes Dr. Koussevitzky may have had in mind the foundation he has established as a memorial to his wife and which, with limited resources, has already done a lot in this same direction. A fortnight ago this colum listed the composers from whom works had lately been commissioned and recalled those who had completed similar assignments or were at work upon them. The attractive and distinctive Symphony of Martinu is certainly a feather in the Foundation's cap.

There may be some significance in the fact that a proposal of this sort should have been put forth at this particular time. Not so long ago composers seemed to be doing pretty well for themselves, even though the problem outlined above was by no means solved. May we not take it, then, as a sort of reflection on the state of music itself? What we call modern music, though less extreme than it was a while ago, has certainly not captured the popular fancy. And this brings us back to that old bogey, supply and demand. Nevertheless, we must grant Dr. Koussevitzky this much: the rewards for serious music have very seldom been proportionate to its composers' deserts, while far too often they have been miserably inadequate. In last Sunday's Times, a week after the article appeared, two correspondents, not professional musicians, said that they would be very glad to contribute their dollar. So perhaps the idea will catch on.

Radcliffe Night Set For Pops Wednesday

Flowers will bloom in Symphony Hall next Wednesday for Radcliffe Night at the Pops. Starting at 4:15, 10 Radcliffe students in bright dirndls and white blouses will sell gardenias to help swell the coffers of the Music Club, which will use the proceeds of the concert for a music scholarship. Miss Persia Ladd of New Haven heads this committee, which includes Miss Cynthia Bishop, Quincy; Miss Eleanor Perry, Dover, and Miss Suzanne Hagler, Springfield.

Miss Norma Bartolami, a Radcliffe senior, will play Rimsky-Korsakov's concerto for piano and orchestra, and Miss Ellinor Benedict, a junior, will perform Saint-Saens' cello concerto in A minor. Sponsors include, President Ada L. Comstock and Dean Bernice Brown Cronkhite of Radcliffe; Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Piston, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Ballantine, Mr. and Mrs. Melville Smith, Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt, Mr. and Mrs. Keyes DeWitt Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Tozzer, Prof. and Mrs. G. Wallace Woodworth, Dr. and Mrs. Archibald T. Davison, Mr. and Mrs. A. Calvert Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Moors, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Bartolami, Mr. and Mrs. S. Burt Wolbach, Mr. Morris Carter, Mr. Allston Burr, and Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill.

JUNE 30, 1943

Free Concerts Due Again This Summer

The free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will go on as usual this Summer, Arthur Fiedler said yesterday. The 15th season will begin Thursday evening, July 22, and will continue through Wednesday, Aug. 18. Concerts will be given six nights a week, omitting Mondays. They will start at 7:30 and will end at 9 o'clock to conform with dim-out regulations.

Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra of Boston Symphony men will again play in the Edward Hatch Memorial Shell on the Esplanade near the foot of Mt. Vernon st. It was decided to omit Mondays this season, instead of Saturdays as in the past, so that the large numbers of men and women in the military services, in Boston on weekend leave, could enjoy the programs.

Special concerts for children will again be played, on the Wednesday mornings of July 28, Aug. 4, 11 and 18. Support of the concerts will depend on contributions from the public. These should be sent to the

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY -- 1943

Boston

By GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SERIES COMPLETED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Biggs Is Soloist in Handel Organ Concerto—Choruses Aid in 'Ninth'

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony completed its sixty-second of formal concerts on May 1. The year has marked the end of an honorable career as an independent orchestral unit. Membership in the Musician's Union has brought a few advantages, however, not the least of which has been the orchestra's return to the air. The effect of these broadcasts has been evident in the make-up of the programs.

The twenty-third pair of concerts was a case in point. The program numbers seemed peculiarly disjointed, yet so cleverly did Serge Koussevitzky lead from one item to the next that such things as key relationship, contrast and climax were almost forgotten in admiration for the individual performances. As something of a novelty, the conductor opened the program with the Handel Concerto No. 10 in D Minor, for Organ and Orchestra. The soloist was E. Power Biggs, distinguished English organist now resident in Boston. The work had not been heard at these concerts since Mlle. Nadia Boulanger played it in 1925. Mr. Biggs revived it two years ago at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and it easily bears repetition, especially as heard under his skillful fingers. A smooth performance of the Schubert 'Unfinished' Symphony followed, and the first half of the program closed with an impressive presentation of the Prelude to 'Parsifal', by Wagner.

A first performance in Boston of Frederick Jacobi's 'Ode' for Orchestra opened the second half of the program. Composed in 1941, the work was given its premiere in San Francisco by Pierre Monteux last February. It was inspired, according to the composer, by a prayer from the Hebrew Morning Sabbath Service. It is entirely program music, and very dependent upon the text. Without a legend, the work might easily be misconstrued, as its relation to a biblical passage is not too apparent. The composer was present to take a bow from the stage at the conclusion of a brilliant performance.

There followed a superb publication of the Ravel Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, was the soloist. Orchestra and artist combined to make the performance a memorable one. A colorful interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Russian Easter' Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36, closed this penultimate concert.

The final pair of concerts were given on April 30 and May 1, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Liadoff's 'From the Apocalypse'—Symphonic Picture Op. 66, was revived to open the program, which also contained the Brahms Symphony No. 4, Op. 98, and the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5, Op. 47. The Apocalypse is essentially program music, and in common with the Jacobi 'Ode' depends for its inspiration upon a biblical text. The chief defference lies in the musical speech of the two composers. Whereas Liadoff is content to use harmonic progressions of what may be termed orthodox though colorful character, Jacobi attempts to depart from regularity with the result that many of his measures seemed forced, instead of a spontaneous expression. Dr. Koussevitzy appeared to realize the Liadoff score to the fullest extent.

It is now something of a tradition that Brahms should be heard on the final program of the year. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting any one of the four is always welcome. The Shostakovich symphony came off brilliantly.

Beethoven, Brahms and Rimsky

There have been the customary murmurings against so much "modern" music and the inclusion of so many American works. In this connection it is amusing to find out that out of forty-seven composers listed during the season, only eight have been found to produce scores which met Dr. Koussevitzky's requirements. Even so, this is a fair average. Beethoven, Brahms, and of all composers, Rimsky-Korsakoff, lead off with five performances each. Wagner was runner-up with four performances and Debussy, Prokofieff, Ravel, Schubert, Shostakovich, Smetana and Strauss tied for third place with three performances each.

For the final Pension Fund Concert this year, the orchestra performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano, Anna Kaskas, contralto, Kurt Baum, tenor and Julius Huehn, bass. Prefacing the symphony with an effective performance of the 'Leonore' Overture No. 3. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted one of the most brilliant readings of the Beethoven which has come to our ears in a long time. Not only was the orchestra in top form, but the singers also were considerably more than adequate. The choral numbers were delivered neatly and melodiously, and while the chorus was large it lacked the body that comes from mature voices, despite which it did far more than a passable job.

Mesdames Lisichkina and Kaskas are well endowed with vocal excellences and were wholly equal to the demands made upon them. Likewise Messrs. Baum and Huehn were heard to good advantage, although it is possible that Mr. Huehn's deeper voice made the more lasting impression.

Programs for Service Men

Among the season's extra-curricula activities of the orchestra, many special concerts have been given by its members for war benefits and the armed forces which have included two series of concerts in Symphony Hall exclusively for uniformed men and women; a memorable concert in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., for the Russian War Relief; three victory Concerts at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; a United Nations Concert in Symphony Hall and concerts at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and Camp Myles Standish, in Massachusetts, and at the United States Naval Training Station in Newport, R. I. These are only a few of the concerts which our orchestra has given the past season as its contribution to the war effort.

With the closing of our formal orchestra concerts, came the opening of the fifty-sixth season of Pops, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. The novelty of the opening night on May 4 was an excerpt from the Symphonic Poem 'Bouriati-Monoglie', by Glière. We believe this to have been the first performance in Boston of Glière's tribute to the hardy herdsmen of the RSSA to the south of Siberia. The composer wrote this work in 1940 and it is an arresting piece of orchestration. Also played were: 'Semper Fidelis' by Sousa; the Overture to the 'Barber of Seville' by Rossini; a portion of the Nutcracker Suite by Tchaikovsky; an interesting arrangement of a Frescobaldi Toccata made by Hans Kindler; and works by Steiner, Komzak, Morton Gould and Peter Bodge.

The second night brought forward a pair of young American girls. Ellinor Benedict, Radcliffe '44, was heard in the Saint Saens concerto in A Minor, Op. 33, for 'cello and orchestra, and Norma Bertolami, Radcliffe '42, played a first performance in Boston of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Concerto for piano and orchestra. Officially this was Radcliffe night and the soloists were chosen through competitive examination. Miss Benedict, who is a pupil of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, played with the authority of one many years her senior. Miss Betrolami, a pupil of Heinrich Gebhard, played with poise and clarity. In addition to the solo items, Mr. Fiedler offered an assortment of orchestral works by Schubert, Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Mozart, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others.

The seventeenth season of the Boston Civic Symphony closed on April 25 with Joseph Wagner, conductor, again arranging an attractive program. The orchestra was assisted by the Apollo Club of Boston, Dean Winslow Hanscom, conductor, and Artiss DeVolt, harpist. The concert was held in Jordan Hall, as usual, and the program comprised items by Beethoven, Grieg, Debussy ('Danse Sacree and Dance Profané) for harp, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saëns, and Sullivan. Choral numbers included works by Bach, Jacob Handl, Mendelssohn, Orlando di Lasso and Frederick S. Converse. George Faulkner was the organist. The solos by Miss deVolt were particularly well received.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
MAY 1 - 1943

Musical Quiz Scheduled on Blue Network

Program To Be Part Of Boston 'Pops' Concerts Saturdays

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP)—The Boston Symphony "pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blue after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera boradcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

Guests for Bondwagon

The Saturday Bondwagon on MBS tonight will be extended to 45 minutes to dedicate the network's new Broadway theater-studio. Special guests have been invited. . . . Mrs. Philip Crowlie, OPA selected "typical American housewife," will be guest on Roy Porter's commentary on the Blue Sunday night. They will discuss point rationing and its problems.

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
MAY 1 - 1943

Boston Symphony Plans Musical Quiz on Radio

New York, May 1.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

[70]

MAY MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Another season, the 62d. of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gone by in no time at all. Yesterday afternoon the last Friday concert was given, and tonight the season will be ended.

Serge Koussevitzky's final program, conforming to the custom of only "familiar" music on such occasions, brings forward the Symphonic Picture, Op. 66, "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff; Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich. The first of the three was last heard in these series in 1937; both the Brahms and Shostakovich were done in 1941-42.

Liadoff wanted to depict, with all the resources of the modern orchestra, the Angel of St. John who stood upon the sea and the earth and whose voice was answered by seven thunders. That is a large order.

Needless to say, Liadoff came nowhere near accomplishing his purpose. He was talented but he was not a musical giant. Richard Wagner or Gustav Mahler or, in another form of expression, Cecil B. De Mille, could have done it better.

There are many pleasant and some impressive sonorities in "From the Apocalypse," but the work is earthbound and ineffectual. It seems, too, that Liadoff had in the back of his mind the "Russian Easter" Overture of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the Astrologer from that composer's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," lurks about at the beginning.

Liadoff's music, like that of Brahms and Shostakovitch, fared magnificently at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Brahms had all the vitality and weight latent in the notes, but and conductor can bring to actuality.

There will be many to disagree which only such a great orchestra with the opinion that the four Brahms symphonies could be put by for a few years. Of their stature there can be no dispute. They are great masterpieces. But, as all fish withereth like the grass, even can a masterpiece become staled by frequent hearing.

Yesterday one was only too aware of the structure beneath the decoration of sound; the seams and the jointure of each movement—except the Dionysiac scherzo—were all too apparent. If these symphonies were to go unheard for a time their freshness would be renewed, and their prestine luster would be regained.

One still holds the conviction that the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony does not equal his Sixth and Seventh. True, there are marvelous pages, but there are also places where his inspiration flags and the ideas are thinned by dilution.

Passages exist in first movement and finale when the tempo slackens and the music begins to wander. And at such places this listener begins to squirm. Nor is the slow movement very substantial. But the fast portions of the first and last movements and all of the scherzo are first-rate music, with their breezy spirit and their cheerful din.

Some people walked out on Shostakovich. Of course they may have been late for cocktails or tea. But otherwise the afternoon was characterized by most cordial applause. Both the Friday and Saturday audiences are responsive to ceremonial occasions. The opening and closing concerts are such.

It was appropriate and expected, therefore, that Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra, at another leave-taking, were tendered an enthusiastic demonstration at the end of the concert. C. W. D.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
MAY 1 - 1943

ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL
MAY 1 - 1943

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Eastern War Time

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — The Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour in the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

"Pops" Enter the Lists: Open May 2 Tuesday

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler as conductor, will open their 58th season next Tuesday. There will be an orchestra of more than 85 symphony players and concerts each night through the spring and early summer. Arthur Fiedler will spare no pains to bring his programs up to the minute, while relying in larger part upon the standing favorites which make the Pops as popular as they are.

Wednesday night will be Radcliffe night, with Norma Bertolami, pianist, and Elinor Benedict, 'cellist, as soloists; and Thursday will be Harvard Night, with Malcolm Holmes and G. Wallace Woodworth as guest conductors and numbers by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. On Saturday the soloist will be Leo Litwin in Weber's Conzertstueck. Sunday will bring a concert for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, with a program drawn from Request Nights of the past and featuring Jesus Maria Sanroma in the Rhapsody in Blue. The programs of the week follow:

Opening Night
Tuesday, May 4, at 8:15

"Semper Fidelis," March ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Hora Burlesca ..... Steiner
Suite from the Ballet "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Heroic March (Symphonic Poem) ..... Glière
"Bouriati-Mongolie" ..... Glière
Toccata ..... Frescobaldi-Kindler
Ouverture Solemelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
"Girls of Baden," Waltzes ..... Komzak
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute ..... Gould
Salute to our Armed Forces ..... Bodge
Arranged by Bodge.

Radcliffe Night
Wednesday, May 5, at 8:15

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlios
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 53 ..... Saint-Saens
Soloist: Ellinor Benedict
"Eine Zleine Nachtmusk," Serenade for String Orchestra ..... Mozart
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Concerto for Piano ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Soloist: Norma Bertolami
"Roses from the South," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Jazz Pizzicato ..... Anderson
Navy Wings ..... Weeks-Faziol

Harvard Night
Thursday, May 6, at 8:15

Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
Triumphal March from "Peter and the Wolf" ..... Prokofieff
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Pavane for a Dead Infanta ..... Ravel
Finale from the Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
Guest Conductor: G. Wallace Woodworth
Masonic Music ..... Mozart
Casey Jones ..... American Folk Song
Choruses from "Iolanthe" ..... Sullivan
Incidental Music to "Alice in Wonderland" ..... Irving G. Fine
(With the assistance of the Radcliffe Choral Society)
Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
"Emperor" Waltzes ..... Strauss
"Peacock Pie," Suite for Piano and Strings ..... Armstrong Gibbs
Solo Piano: Leo Litwin
Prayer of Thanksgiving ..... Valeritus
Fair Harvard

Friday, May 7, at 8:15

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" ..... R. Strauss
Sarabande and Gavotte for Strings ..... Ferris Cox
Bolero ..... Ravel
Piano concerto in A minor ..... Schumann
Soloist: Denise Bacon
Peer Gynt Suite ..... Grieg
Polka from the Ballet "The Golden Age" ..... Shostakovitch
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizat

Saturday, May 8, at 8:15

"Pomp and Circumstance," March ..... Elgar
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
"Artists' Life," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Salute to Our Armed Forces ..... Bodge
Arranged by Bodge
Regis College Glee Club,
Conducted by Mary Louise Gallen
The Year's at the Spring ..... Cain
Moonlight Serenade ..... Drigo
Dance, Ye Gypsies! ..... Brahms
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Conzertstuck for Piano and Orchestra ..... Weber
Soloist: Leo Litwin
Strike Up the Band ..... Gershwin

Sunday, May 9, at 3:15

"Stars and Stripes Forever," March ..... Sousa
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
The Flight of the Bumblebee ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Ballet Music from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Largo from the Opera "Xerxes" ..... Handel
Bolero ..... Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue ..... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes ..... Strauss

SALEM, O.
NEWS
MAY 1 - 1943

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL
MAY 1 - 1943

Radio Day By Day

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York, May 1 (AP) — The Boston symphony "Pops" concerts which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blu after tonight, will incorporate musical quiz. It will be under th guidance of Milton J. Cross, oper broadcaster, who also will provid the commentary.

While the music of the lighte popular nature in contrast to th winter series will be primary, qui periods will be injected. Arthu Fielder, who has directed th "Pops" concerts since 1930, wi be the conductor.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY -- 1943

Boston

By GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SERIES COMPLETED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Biggs Is Soloist in Handel Organ Concerto—Choruses Aid in 'Ninth'

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony completed its sixty-second of formal concerts on May 1. The year has marked the end of an honorable career as an independent orchestral unit. Membership in the Musician's Union has brought a few advantages, however, not the least of which has been the orchestra's return to the air. The effect of these broadcasts has been evident in the make-up of the programs.

The twenty-third pair of concerts was a case in point. The program numbers seemed peculiarly disjointed, yet so cleverly did Serge Koussevitzky lead from one item to the next that such things as key relationship, contrast and climax were almost forgotten in admiration for the individual performances. As something of a novelty, the conductor opened the program with the Handel Concerto No. 10 in D Minor, for Organ and Orchestra. The soloist was E. Power Biggs, distinguished English organist now resident in Boston. The work had not been heard at these concerts since Mlle. Nadia Boulanger played it in 1925. Mr. Biggs revived it two years ago at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and it easily bears repetition, especially as heard under his skillful fingers. A smooth performance of the Schubert 'Unfinished' Symphony followed, and the first half of the program closed with an impressive presentation of the Prelude to 'Parsifal', by Wagner.

A first performance in Boston of Frederick Jacobi's 'Ode' for Orchestra opened the second half of the program. Composed in 1941, the work was given its premiere in San Francisco by Pierre Monteux last February. It was inspired, according to the composer, by a prayer from the Hebrew Morning Sabbath Service. It is entirely program music, and very dependent upon the text. Without a legend, the work might easily be misconstrued, as its relation to a biblical passage is not too apparent. The composer was present to take a bow from the stage at the conclusion of a brilliant performance.

There followed a superb publication of the Ravel Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, was the soloist. Orchestra and artist combined to make the performance a memorable one. A colorful interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Russian Easter' Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36, closed this penultimate concert.

The final pair of concerts were given on April 30 and May 1, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Liadoff's 'From the Apocalypse'—Symphonic Picture Op. 66, was revived to open the program, which also contained the Brahms Symphony No. 4, Op. 98, and the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5, Op. 47. The Apocalypse is essentially program music, and in common with the Jacobi 'Ode' depends for its inspiration upon a biblical text. The chief defference lies in the musical speech of the two composers. Whereas Liadoff is content to use harmonic progressions of what may be termed orthodox though colorful character, Jacobi attempts to depart from regularity with the result that many of his measures seemed forced, instead of a spontaneous expression. Dr. Koussevitzy appeared to realize the Liadoff score to the fullest extent.

It is now something of a tradition that Brahms should be heard on the final program of the year. Dr. Koussevtizky's conducting any one of the four is always welcome. The Shostakovich symphony came off brilliantly.

Beethoven, Brahms and Rimsky

There have been the customary murmurings against so much "modern" music and the inclusion of so many American works. In this connection it is amusing to find out that out of forty-seven composers listed during the season, only eight have been found to produce scores which met Dr. Koussevitzky's requirements. Even so, this is a fair average. Beethoven, Brahms, and of all composers, Rimsky-Korsakoff, lead off with five performances each. Wagner was runner-up with four performances and Debussy Prokofieff, Ravel, Schubert, Shostakovich, Smetana and Strauss tied for third place with three performances each.

For the final Pension Fund Concert this year, the orchestra performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano, Anna Kaskas, contralto, Kurt Baum, tenor and Julius Huehn, bass. Prefacing the symphony with an effective performance of the 'Leonore' Overture No. 3. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted one of the most brilliant readings of the Beethoven which has come to our ears in a long time. Not only was the orchestra in top form, but the singers also were considerably more than adequate. The choral numbers were delivered neatly and melodiously, and while the chorus was large it lacked the body that comes from mature voices, despite which it did far more than a passable job.

Mesdames Lisichkina and Kaskas are well endowed with vocal excellences and were wholly equal to the demands made upon them. Likewise Messrs. Baum and Huehn were heard to good advantage, although it is possible that Mr. Huehn's deeper voice made the more lasting impression.

Programs for Service Men

Among the season's extra-curricula activities of the orchestra, many special concerts have been given by its members for war benefits and the armed forces which have included two series of concerts in Symphony Hall exclusively for uniformed men and women; a memorable concert in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., for the Russian War Relief; three victory Concerts at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; a United Nations Concert in Symphony Hall and concerts at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and Camp Myles Standish, in Massachusetts, and at the United States Naval Training Station in Newport, R. I. These are only a few of the concerts which our orchestra has given the past season as its contribution to the war effort.

With the closing of our formal orchestra concerts, came the opening of the fifty-sixth season of Pops, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. The novelty of the opening night on May 4 was an excerpt from the Symphonic Poem 'Bouriati-Monoglie', by Glière. We believe this to have been the first performance in Boston of Glière's tribute to the hardy herdsmen of the RSSA to the south of Siberia. The composer wrote this work in 1940 and it is an arresting piece of orchestration. Also played were: 'Semper Fidelis' by Sousa; the Overture to the 'Barber of Seville' by Rossini; a portion of the Nutcracker Suite by Tchaikovsky; an interesting arrangement of a Frescobaldi Toccata made by Hans Kindler; and works by Steiner, Komzak, Morton Gould and Peter Bodge.

The second night brought forward a pair of young American girls. Ellinor Benedict, Radcliffe '44, was heard in the Saint Saens concerto in A Minor, Op. 33, for 'cello and orchestra, and Norma Bertolami, Radcliffe '42, played a first performance in Boston of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Concerto for piano and orchestra. Officially this was Radcliffe night and the soloists were chosen through competitive examination. Miss Benedict, who is a pupil of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, played with the authority of one many years her senior. Miss Betrolami, a pupil of Heinrich Gebhard, played with poise and clarity. In addition to the solo items, Mr. Fiedler offered an assortment of orchestral works by Schubert, Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Mozart, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others.

The seventeenth season of the Boston Civic Symphony closed on April 25 with Joseph Wagner, conductor, again arranging an attractive program. The orchestra was assisted by the Apollo Club of Boston, Dean Winslow Hanscom, conductor, and Artiss DeVolt, harpist. The concert was held in Jordan Hall, as usual, and the program comprised items by Beethoven, Grieg, Debussy ('Danse Sacree and Dance Profané) for harp, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saëns, and Sullivan. Choral numbers included works by Bach, Jacob Handl, Mendelssohn, Orlando di Lasso and Frederick S. Converse. George Faulkner was the organist. The solos by Miss deVolt were particularly well received.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
MAY 1 - 1943

Musical Quiz Scheduled on Blue Network

Program To Be Part Of Boston 'Pops' Concerts Saturdays

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP)—The Boston Symphony "pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blue after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera boradcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

Guests for Bondwagon

The Saturday Bondwagon on MBS tonight will be extended to 45 minutes to dedicate the network's new Broadway theater-studio. Special guests have been invited. . . . Mrs. Philip Crowlie, OPA selected "typical American housewife," will be guest on Roy Porter's commentary on the Blue Sunday night. They will discuss point rationing and its problems.

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
MAY 1 - 1943

Boston Symphony Plans Musical Quiz on Radio

New York, May 1.—(AP)— The Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

[70]

MAY MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Another season, the 62d, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone by in no time at all. Yesterday afternoon the last Friday concert was given, and tonight the season will be ended.

Serge Koussevitzky's final program, conforming to the custom of only "familiar" music on such occasions, brings forward the Symphonic Picture, Op. 66, "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff; Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich. The first of the three was last heard in these series in 1937; both the Brahms and Shostakovich were done in 1941-42.

Liadoff wanted to depict, with all the resources of the modern orchestra, the Angel of St. John who stood upon the sea and the earth and whose voice was answered by seven thunders. That is a large order.

Needless to say, Liadoff came nowhere near accomplishing his purpose. He was talented but he was not a musical giant. Richard Wagner or Gustav Mahler or, in another form of expression, Cecil B. De Mille, could have done it better.

There are many pleasant and some impressive sonorities in "From the Apocalypse," but the work is earthbound and ineffectual. It seems, too, that Liadoff had in the back of his mind the "Russian Easter" Overture of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the Astrologer from that composer's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," lurks about at the beginning.

Liadoff's music, like that of Brahms and Shostakovitch, fared magnificently at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Brahms had all the vitality and weight latent in the notes, but and conductor can bring to actuality.

There will be many to disagree which only such a great orchestra with the opinion that the four Brahms symphonies could be put by for a few years. Of their stature there can be no dispute. They are great masterpieces. But, as all fish withereth like the grass, even can a masterpiece become staled by frequent hearing.

Yesterday one was only too aware of the structure beneath the decoration of sound; the seams and the jointure of each movement—except the Dionysiac scherzo—were all too apparent. If these symphonies were to go unheard for a time their freshness would be renewed, and their prestine luster would be regained.

One still holds the conviction that the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony does not equal his Sixth and Seventh. True, there are marvelous pages, but there are also places where his inspiration flags and the ideas are thinned by dilution.

Passages exist in first movement and finale when the tempo slackens and the music begins to wander. And at such places this listener begins to squirm. Nor is the slow movement very substantial. But the fast portions of the first and last movements and all of the scherzo are first-rate music, with their breezy spirit and their cheerful din.

Some people walked out on Shostakovich. Of course they may have been late for cocktails or tea. But otherwise the afternoon was characterized by most cordial applause. Both the Friday and Saturday audiences are responsive to ceremonial occasions. The opening and closing concerts are such.

It was appropriate and expected, therefore, that Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra, at another leave-taking, were tendered an enthusiastic demonstration at the end of the concert. C. W. D.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
MAY 1 - 1943

ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL
MAY 1 - 1943

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Eastern War Time

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — The Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour in the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

"Pops" Enter the Lists: Open May 2 Next Tuesday

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler as conductor, will open their 58th season next Tuesday. There will be an orchestra of more than 85 symphony players and concerts each night through the spring and early summer. Arthur Fiedler will spare no pains to bring his programs up to the minute, while relying in larger part upon the standing favorites which make the Pops as popular as they are.

Wednesday night will be Radcliffe night, with Norma Bertolami, pianist, and Elinor Benedict, 'cellist, as soloists; and Thursday will be Harvard Night, with Malcolm Holmes and G. Wallace Woodworth as guest conductors and numbers by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. On Saturday the soloist will be Leo Litwin in Weber's Conzertstueck. Sunday will bring a concert for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, with a program drawn from Request Nights of the past and featuring Jesus Maria Sanroma in the Rhapsody in Blue. The programs of the week follow:

Opening Night
Tuesday, May 4, at 8:15

"Semper Fidelis," March.....Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Rossini
Hora Burlesca.....Steiner
Suite from the Ballet "Nutcracker" Tchaikovsky
Heroic March (Symphonic Poem)
"Bouriati-Mongolie".....Gliere
Toccata.....Frescobaldi-Kindler
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
"Girls of Baden," Waltzes.....Komzak
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute.....Gould
Salute to our Armed Forces
Arranged by Bodge

Radcliffe Night
Wednesday, May 5, at 8:15

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"...Berlios
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 53.....Saint-Saens
Soloist: Ellinor Benedict
"Eine Zleine Nachtmusk," Serenade for String Orchestra.....Mozart
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Concerto for Piano.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Soloist: Norma Bertolami
"Roses from the South," Waltzes.....Strauss
Jazz Pizzicato.....Anderson
Navy Wings.....Weeks-Fazioli

Harvard Night
Thursday, May 6, at 8:15

Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
Triumphal March from "Peter and the Wolf".....Prokofieff
Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" Glinka
Pavane for a Dead Infanta.....Ravel
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tchaikovsky
Guest Conductor: G. Wallace Woodworth
Masonic Music.....Mozart
Casey Jones.....American Folk Song
Choruses from "Iolanthe".....Sullivan
Incidental Music to "Alice in Wonderland".....Irving G. Fine
(With the assistance of the Radcliffe Choral Society)
Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
"Emperor" Waltzes.....Strauss
"Peacock Pie," Suite for Piano and Strings.....Armstrong Gibbs
Solo Piano: Leo Litwin
Prayer of Thanksgiving.....Valerius
Fair Harvard

Friday, May 7, at 8:15

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakov
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
Sarabande and Gavotte for Strings Persis Cox
Bolero.....Ravel
Piano concerto in A minor.....Schumann
Soloist: Denise Bacon
Peer Gynt Suite.....Grieg
Polka from the Ballet "The Golden Age".....Shostakovitch
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet

Saturday, May 8, at 8:15

"Pomp and Circumstance," March..Elgar
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1.....Enesco
"Artists' Life," Waltzes.....Strauss
Salute to Our Armed Forces Arranged by Bodge
Regis College Glee Club,
Conducted by Mary Louise Gallen
The Year's at the Spring.....Cain
Moonlight Serenade.....Drigo
Dance, Ye Gypsies!.....Brahms
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Concertstuck for Piano and Orchestra Weber
Soloist: Leo Litwin
Strike Up the Band.....Gershwin

Sunday, May 9, at 8:15

"Stars and Stripes Forever," March Sousa
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
The Flight of the Bumblebee Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Largo from the Opera "Xerxes"....Handel
Bolero.....Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes.....Strauss

SALEM, O.
NEWS
MAY 1 - 1943

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL
MAY 1 - 1943

Radio Day By Day

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York, May 1 (AP) — The Boston symphony "Pops" concerts which take over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blue after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY -- 1943

Boston

By GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SERIES COMPLETED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Biggs Is Soloist in Handel Organ Concerto—Choruses Aid in 'Ninth'

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony completed its sixty-second of formal concerts on May 1. The year has marked the end of an honorable career as an independent orchestral unit. Membership in the Musician's Union has brought a few advantages, however, not the least of which has been the orchestra's return to the air. The effect of these broadcasts has been evident in the make-up of the programs.

The twenty-third pair of concerts was a case in point. The program numbers seemed peculiarly disjointed, yet so cleverly did Serge Koussevitzky lead from one item to the next that such things as key relationship, contrast and climax were almost forgotten in admiration for the individual performances. As something of a novelty, the conductor opened the program with the Handel Concerto No. 10 in D Minor, for Organ and Orchestra. The soloist was E. Power Biggs, distinguished English organist now resident in Boston. The work had not been heard at these concerts since Mlle. Nadia Boulanger played it in 1925. Mr. Biggs revived it two years ago at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and it easily bears repetition, especially as heard under his skillful fingers. A smooth performance of the Schubert 'Unfinished' Symphony followed, and the first half of the program closed with an impressive presentation of the Prelude to 'Parsifal', by Wagner.

A first performance in Boston of Frederick Jacobi's 'Ode' for Orchestra opened the second half of the program. Composed in 1941, the work was given its premiere in San Francisco by Pierre Monteux last February. It was inspired, according to the composer, by a prayer from the Hebrew Morning Sabbath Service. It is entirely program music, and very dependent upon the text. Without a legend, the work might easily be misconstrued, as its relation to a biblical passage is not too apparent. The composer was present to take a bow from the stage at the conclusion of a brilliant performance.

There followed a superb publication of the Ravel Introduction and Allegro for Harp and Orchestra. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, was the soloist. Orchestra and artist combined to make the performance a memorable one. A colorful interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Russian Easter' Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36, closed this penultimate concert.

The final pair of concerts were given on April 30 and May 1, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Liadoff's 'From the Apocalypse'—Symphonic Picture Op. 66, was revived to open the program, which also contained the Brahms Symphony No. 4, Op. 98, and the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5, Op. 47. The Apocalypse is essentially program music, and in common with the Jacobi 'Ode' depends for its inspiration upon a biblical text. The chief defference lies in the musical speech of the two composers. Whereas Liadoff is content to use harmonic progressions of what may be termed orthodox though colorful character, Jacobi attempts to depart from regularity with the result that many of his measures seemed forced, instead of a spontaneous expression. Dr. Koussevitzy appeared to realize the Liadoff score to the fullest extent.

It is now something of a tradition that Brahms should be heard on the final program of the year. Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting any one of the four is always welcome. The Shostakovich symphony came off brilliantly.

Beethoven, Brahms and Rimsky

There have been the customary murmurings against so much "modern" music and the inclusion of so many American works. In this connection it is amusing to find out that out of forty-seven composers listed during the season, only eight have been found to produce scores which met Dr. Koussevitzky's requirements. Even so, this is a fair average. Beethoven, Brahms, and of all composers, Rimsky-Korsakoff, lead off with five performances each. Wagner was runner-up with four performances and Debussy Prokofieff, Ravel, Schubert, Shostakovich, Smetana and Strauss tied for third place with three performances each.

For the final Pension Fund Concert this year, the orchestra performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano, Anna Kaskas, contralto, Kurt Baum, tenor and Julius Huehn, bass. Prefacing the symphony with an effective performance of the 'Leonore' Overture No. 3. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted one of the most brilliant readings of the Beethoven which has come to our ears in a long time. Not only was the orchestra in top form, but the singers also were considerably more than adequate. The choral numbers were delivered neatly and melodiously, and while the chorus was large it lacked the body that comes from mature voices, despite which it did far more than a passable job.

Mesdames Lisichkina and Kaskas are well endowed with vocal excellences and were wholly equal to the demands made upon them. Likewise Messrs. Baum and Huehn were heard to good advantage, although it is possible that Mr. Huehn's deeper voice made the more lasting impression.

Programs for Service Men

Among the season's extra-curricula activities of the orchestra, many special concerts have been given by its members for war benefits and the armed forces which have included two series of concerts in Symphony Hall exclusively for uniformed men and women; a memorable concert in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., for the Russian War Relief; three victory Concerts at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; a United Nations Concert in Symphony Hall and concerts at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and Camp Myles Standish, in Massachusetts, and at the United States Naval Training Station in Newport, R. I. These are only a few of the concerts which our orchestra has given the past season as its contribution to the war effort.

With the closing of our formal orchestra concerts, came the opening of the fifty-sixth season of Pops, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. The novelty of the opening night on May 4 was an excerpt from the Symphonic Poem 'Bouriati-Monoglie', by Glière. We believe this to have been the first performance in Boston of Glière's tribute to the hardy herdsmen of the RSSA to the south of Siberia. The composer wrote this work in 1940 and it is an arresting piece of orchestration. Also played were: 'Semper Fidelis' by Sousa; the Overture to the 'Barber of Seville' by Rossini; a portion of the Nutcracker Suite by Tchaikovsky; an interesting arrangement of a Frescobaidi Toccata made by Hans Kindler; and works by Steiner, Komzak, Morton Gould and Peter Bodge.

The second night brought forward a pair of young American girls. Ellinor Benedict, Radcliffe '44, was heard in the Saint Saens concerto in A Minor, Op. 33, for 'cello and orchestra, and Norma Bertolami, Radcliffe '42, played a first performance in Boston of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Concerto for piano and orchestra. Officially this was Radcliffe night and the soloists were chosen through competitive examination. Miss Benedict, who is a pupil of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, played with the authority of one many years her senior. Miss Betrolami, a pupil of Heinrich Gebhard, played with poise and clarity. In addition to the solo items, Mr. Fiedler offered an assortment of orchestral works by Schubert, Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Mozart, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others.

The seventeenth season of the Boston Civic Symphony closed on April 25 with Joseph Wagner, conductor, again arranging an attractive program. The orchestra was assisted by the Apollo Club of Boston, Dean Winslow Hanscom, conductor, and Artiss DeVolt, harpist. The concert was held in Jordan Hall, as usual, and the program comprised items by Beethoven, Grieg, Debussy ('Danse Sacree and Dance Profané') for harp, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saëns, and Sullivan. Choral numbers included works by Bach, Jacob Handl, Mendelssohn, Orlando di Lasso and Frederick S. Converse. George Faulkner was the organist. The solos by Miss deVolt were particularly well received.

GRACE MAY STUTSMAN

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
MAY 1 - 1943

Musical Quiz Scheduled on Blue Network

Program To Be Part Of Boston 'Pops' Concerts Saturdays

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP)—The Boston Symphony "pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blue after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera boradcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

Guests for Bondwagon

The Saturday Bondwagon on MBS tonight will be extended to 45 minutes to dedicate the network's new Broadway theater-studio. Special guests have been invited. . . . Mrs. Philip Crowlie, OPA selected "typical American housewife," will be guest on Roy Porter's commentary on the Blue Sunday night. They will discuss point rationing and its problems.

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
MAY 1 - 1943

Boston Symphony Plans Musical Quiz on Radio

New York, May 1.—(AP)— The Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed the "Pops" concerts since 1930, will be the conductor.

[70]

May MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Another season, the 62d, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone by in no time at all. Yesterday afternoon the last Friday concert was given, and tonight the season will be ended.

Serge Koussevitzky's final program, conforming to the custom of only "familiar" music on such occasions, brings forward the Symphonic Picture, Op. 66, "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff; Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich. The first of the three was last heard in these series in 1937; both the Brahms and Shostakovich were done in 1941-42.

Liadoff wanted to depict, with all the resources of the modern orchestra, the Angel of St. John who stood upon the sea and the earth and whose voice was answered by seven thunders. That is a large order.

Needless to say, Liadoff came nowhere near accomplishing his purpose. He was talented but he was not a musical giant. Richard Wagner or Gustav Mahler or, in another form of expression, Cecil B. De Mille, could have done it better.

There are many pleasant and some impressive sonorities in "From the Apocalypse," but the work is earthbound and inffectual. It seems, too, that Liadoff had in the back of his mind the "Russian Easter" Overture of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the Astrologer from that composer's opera, "The Golden Cockerel," lurks about at the beginning.

Liadoff's music, like that of Brahms and Shostakovitch, fared magnificently at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Brahms had all the vitality and weight latent in the notes, but and conductor can bring to actuality.

There will be many to disagree which only such a great orchestra with the opinion that the four Brahms symphonies could be put by for a few years. Of their stature there can be no dispute. They are great masterpieces. But, as all fish withereth like the grass, even can a masterpiece become staled by frequent hearing.

Yesterday one was only too aware of the structure beneath the decoration of sound; the seams and the jointure of each movement—except the Dionysiac scherzo—were all too apparent. If these symphonies were to go unheard for a time their freshness would be renewed, and their prestine luster would be regained.

One still holds the conviction that the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony does not equal his Sixth and Seventh. True, there are marvelous pages, but there are also places where his inspiration flags and the ideas are thinned by dilution.

Passages exist in first movement and finale when the tempo slackens and the music begins to wander. And at such places this listener begins to squirm. Nor is the slow movement very substantial. But the fast portions of the first and last movements and all of the scherzo are first-rate music, with their breezy spirit and their cheerful din.

Some people walked out on Shostakovich. Of course they may have been late for cocktails or tea. But otherwise the afternoon was characterized by most cordial applause. Both the Friday and Saturday audiences are responsive to ceremonial occasions. The opening and closing concerts are such.

It was appropriate and expected, therefore, that Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra, at another leave-taking, were tendered an enthusiastic demonstration at the end of the concert. C. W. D.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
MAY 1 - 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY "POPS" CONCERTS TO INCLUDE QUIZ

By Associated Press.

The Boston Symphony "Pop" concerts, which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the Blue starting next week, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

While the music of the lighter popular nature in contrast to the winter series will be primary, quiz periods will be injected. Arthur Fielder, who has directed [illegible] 1930.

[illegible] Va.

[illegible] report for duty at Fort Mon-

[illegible] Charlotte Duvall, who was a [illegible] in a Texas and Oklahoma [illegible] a field artillery unit during the [illegible] war, has been commissioned [illegible] lieutenant-colonel in an artillery unit, and will leave Monday

---

"Pops" Enter the Lists: Open Tuesday

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler as conductor, will open their 58th season next Tuesday. There will be an orchestra of more than 85 symphony players and concerts each night through the spring and early summer. Arthur Fiedler will spare no pains to bring his programs up to the minute, while relying in larger part upon the standing favorites which make the Pops as popular as they are.

Wednesday night will be Radcliffe night, with Norma Bertolami, pianist, and Elinor Benedict, 'cellist, as soloists; and Thursday will be Harvard Night, with Malcolm Holmes and G. Wallace Woodworth as guest conductors and numbers by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. On Saturday the soloist will be Leo Litwin in Weber's Conzertstueck. Sunday will bring a concert for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, with a program drawn from Request Nights of the past and featuring Jesus Maria Sanroma in the Rhapsody in Blue. The programs of the week follow:

Opening Night
Tuesday, May 4, at 8:15

"Semper Fidelis," March ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Rossini
Hora Burlesca ..... Steiner
Suite from the Ballet "Nutcracker" Tchaikovsky
Heroic March (Symphonic Poem)
"Bouriati-Mongolie" ..... Gliere
Toccata ..... Frescobaldi-Kindler
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
"Girls of Baden," Waltzes ..... Komzak
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute ..... Gould
Salute to our Armed Forces
Arranged by Bodge

Radcliffe Night
Wednesday, May 5, at 8:15

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .. Berlios
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 53 ..... Saint-Saens
Soloist: Ellinor Benedict
"Eine Zleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra ..... Mozart
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Concerto for Piano ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Soloist: Norma Bertolami
"Roses from the South," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Jazz Pizzicato ..... Anderson
Navy Wings ..... Weeks-Fazioli

Harvard Night
Thursday, May 6, at 8:15

Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
Triumphal March from "Peter and the Wolf" ..... Prokofieff
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" Glinka
Pavane for a Dead Infanta ..... Ravel
Finale from the Fourth Symphony Tchaikovsky
Guest Conductor: G. Wallace Woodworth
Masonic Music ..... Mozart
Casey Jones ..... American Folk Song
Choruses from "Iolanthe" ..... Sullivan
Incidental Music to "Alice in Wonderland" ..... Irving G. Fine
(With the assistance of the Radcliffe Choral Society)
Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes—
"Emperor" Waltzes ..... Strauss
"Peacock Pie," Suite for Piano and Strings ..... Armstrong Gibbs
Solo Piano: Leo Litwin
Prayer of Thanksgiving ..... Valerius
Fair Harvard

Friday, May 7, at 8:15

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" Rimsky-Korsakov
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
Sarabande and Gavotte for Strings Persis Cox
Bolero ..... Ravel
Piano concerto in A minor ..... Schumann
Soloist: Denise Bacon
Peer Gynt Suite ..... Grieg
Polka from the Ballet "The Golden Age" ..... Shostakovitch
Farandole from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet

Saturday, May 8, at 8:15

"Pomp and Circumstance," March .. Elgar
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
"Artists' Life," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Salute to Our Armed Forces
Arranged by Bodge
Regis College Glee Club,
Conducted by Mary Louise Gallen
The Year's at the Spring ..... Cain
Moonlight Serenade ..... Drigo
Dance, Ye Gypsies! ..... Brahms
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Conzertstuck for Piano and Orchestra Weber
Soloist: Leo Litwin
Strike Up the Band ..... Gershwin

Sunday, May 9, at 8:15

"Stars and Stripes Forever," March Sousa
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
The Flight of the Bumblebee Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Ballet Music from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Largo from the Opera "Xerxes" .... Handel
Bolero ..... Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue ..... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes ..... Strauss

SALEM, O.
NEWS
MAY 1 - 1943

Musical Quiz To Be Part of Symphony Hour

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK, May 1—The Boston Symphony "pops" concerts which takes over the Boston Symphony's Saturday hour on the BLU after tonight, will incorporate a musical quiz. It will be under the guidance of Milton J. Cross, opera broadcaster, who also will provide the commentary.

Dr. Koussevitzky Scores Triumph in Season's Final Concert

Herald May 7

-Pops Begin at Symphony Hall Tuesday

Globe May 2 '43

was as follows:
Liadov....."From the Apocalypse," Op. 66
Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
Shostakovitch...Symphony No. 5, Op. 47

Yesterday was, as it should be, Dr. Koussevitzky's day. The music was as expected; that is to say, the Liadov was noisily trivial, the Brahms spoke as gratefully as it always does and the Shostakovitch, wearing better than expected, came to a triumphant conclusion with everything but the firing off of cannons and the descent, from the proscenium arch, of the flag of the four freedoms.

It was not only Koussevitzky's day, it was the culmination of Koussevitzky's season, for no man has shown so profound an inward change as he in this his 19th season as conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony. We have had occasion to note this inexplicable growth and development before and have been confounded by it. The exact nature of the flowering of his art escapes definition at the moment; indeed, it may well be of so personal a nature as make discussion of it an impropriety. But it exists none the less, and has brought about a profoundly more spiritual quality in his reading of those works which seem to speak most urgently to him.

It developed yesterday, in all places, in the Shostakovitch. It is plain to be seen that Shostakovitch strikes a remarkably sympathetic chord in Dr. Koussevitzky. Many of us may sit by quite unaffected; wondering in point of fact, how so astute a musician cannot hear its manufactured banalities, its screaming artificialities and its essentially rabble-rousing motivation. This is not to deny it any musical standing whatever for it is striking purely as sound and it has some undeniably bright spots in it.

The first two movements are, it seems to us, far and away the best, and they more than anything else keep it alive. Then along comes that interminable largo and that outrageously tinny finale, and life becomes a husk . . . except that the conductor's vivid conception of it nearly sweeps you off your feet, and though you go protesting, you go along with him. When a conductor can make you do that, you cannot but give him his due. The point is, though, he has never demonstrated his mastery over both orchestra and audience quite so overwhelmingly as he has in the truly memorable programs of this season. Regrettably enough, those memorable programs have been too few for our liking, but they've been frequent enough to prove beyond question when they came along that Dr. Koussevitzky's powers, so far from declining, have actually increased beyond measure.

Inasmuch as it is a well-known phenomenon that the last Brahms you have heard is the best Brahms you have heard, the Fourth seemed greater than ever. It seemed to us that the first movement was not informed with the architectural homogeneity Dr. Koussevitzky usually achieves, and that it went by fits and starts, but the succeeding three movements were miraculously traversed. Although its season has been especially arduous what with the discomfort of its travels, the orchestra, to the last man, deserves the utmost praise for its part in the abundant musical glories, of which by no means the least occurred yesterday. Well aware of its unique fortune in having so prodigious an organization in its midst, the audience gave both orchestra and conductor a prolonged ovation. The season thus came to a

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 2 - 1943

Boston Pops Season Set for Network

Fiedler Will Conduct Orchestra Starting May 8

The world-famous Boston Symphony Pops concerts, for 57 years one of the outstanding musical events in the cultural life of Boston, will be broadcast over the coast-to-coast Blue network including WFCI every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., starting May 8, to the conclusion of the Pops season in mid-July.

Conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, inspired young American who has directed the orchestra during these Pops series since 1930. Milton J. Cross, commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Company broadcasts, and a pioneer announcer in radio, will offer the commentaries during each program.

Interesting to note, is that where the regular winter programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, were the epitome of decorum and pin-drop silence, the Pops concerts are held in an atmosphere of gaiety.

The Pops possess what the critics proclaim "a smooth and happy blending of music and sociability"—light music and what are termed the "light classics," all integrated into a palatable musical dish for the listeners, who will be legion in view of the broadcasting aspect.

For this series of concerts, staid Boston Symphony Hall is given a thorough "going-over," seats being ripped from the floor and tables substituted. Smoking is permitted, whispering encouraged, and waitresses summoned for the inevitable "Pops Punch."

Arthur Fiedler was born in Boston, son of a noted European artist who came to this country to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The parent Emmanuel Fiedler, was a member of the original Kneisel Quartet.

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
MAY 3 - 1943

Review of the Boston Symphony's 62d Season

Union Agreement and Return to Radio Important Events

The 62d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not especially brilliant but it had a certain amount of excitement. The most important event of the season was, of course, the entrance of the orchestra into the American Federation of Musicians.

Thus far there have been no visible changes wrought upon either the orchestra or its performances by the complete change of status. Whether any will develop remains to be seen. The end of the 62d season finds the Boston Symphony still occupying undisputed its exalted rank of "the best orchestra in the world."

Signing with the union meant, among other things, that the Boston Symphony could return to broadcasting, which it promptly did, and to making records, which no doubt it will do when Mr. Petrillo's differences with the recording companies have been settled.

Few Soloists

Several years ago, as union pressure on the orchestra became heavier, we began to feel the ban upon soloists. Without doubt, the state of uncertainty which must have existed when the 62d season was planned, was the reason we have had so few soloists in 1942-43. Next season, let us hope, this will be different.

Tremendous response from the radio public followed the first broadcast concerts. It was obvious that Boston Symphony broadcasts would immediately become a prime air feature. So they did. And this leads one to the speculation whether, in the future, entire Boston Symphony concerts, instead of the first hour on Saturday evenings, will be available to the radio public. Shutting off a great orchestra like this promptly at 9:15, seems rather small potatoes.

The Summer Berkshire Music Festivals were last year called off for the duration. Nor will the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Koussevitzky's cherished and valuable educational project, be resumed until the war is over.

This means that for the first time in several years the Summer of 1943 will find the Boston Symphony staying right in Boston, for an extended season of Pops and a month of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade.

The New Music

Now what about the new music of 1942-43? Well, the most disputed, publicized, admired and deprecated new work was unquestionably the Seventh, or "Leningrad" Symphony, by Dmitri Shostakovitch. Putting it upon the first program, last October, Serge Koussevitzky made of it a virtuosic tour de force. It seemed magnificent under his ministration. It is no doubt far too long, yet this writer continues to view the Seventh with admiration.

The novelty second in importance was, to this column, the gorgeously colored and the emotionally intense First Symphony of Bohuslav Martinu, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of the late Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky. The main shortcoming of the Symphony seemed to be its weakness of formal structure, very unaccountable in the case of Martinu for, as his chamber works have revealed, he is ordinarily a master of structure.

The derivative 21st Symphony by Miaskovsky, Lopatnikoff's dry Sinfonietta, and Dukelsky's Violin Concerto, a work with a beautifully written solo part and hardly any orchestral background, all had virtues to recommend. But if any turns out to have a long life, I shall be surprised. Dukelsky's work, had, in addition, the benefit of a very fine preparation and performance by the soloist, Ruth Posselt.

before. Once again, thanks to Richard Burgin for unfamiliar Mahler. Some day, let us hope, we shall have the Third entire.

The most important revivals were of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, with the vocal portions omitted; Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead" and Second Symphony (the latter performed in memory of the composer); the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofieff, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist, and Brahms' "A Song of Destiny," admirably sung by the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club. Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" was another rarity, distinguished by the solo work of soprano Marcelle Denya.

The one guest conductor, George Szell, proved a leader of technical skill and assurance and, quite as vital, of temperament and imagination.

Serge Koussevitzky has now rounded out 19 years as conductor. His re-creative powers have not lessened, even if his programs are steadily shrinking to a circumscribed number of "standard masterpieces." As a great conductor, one of authority and inward comprehension and extraordinary emotional persuasion, he is still a master among masters. C. W. D.

William Schuman's Secular Cantata, "A Free Song," the Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris, and "A Lincoln Portrait" by Aaron Copland all proved engrossing, none without flaws and yet of definite skill and imagination. These three American scores deserve to be heard in future seasons. Mr. Frederick Jacobi's Ode belongs in the same category. A semi-novelty was the orchestral transcription, by guest conductor George Szell, of the E minor Smetana Quartet, "From My Life." It was beautifully scored and made a very good impression.

Unfamiliar Mahler

The first movement of Gustav Mahler's Third Symphony occupied a place all its own for, though hardly new, not a note of this work had been played in Boston

Conductor Says Youth Likes "Heavy Music" If It's Good

ENGLEWOOD, N. J., May 2.—(U.P.)—Wheeler Beckett, conductor-composer who has been conducting concerts of "heavy music" for young people for seven years, said "zoot suit" music is popular only because most boys and girls don't have a chance to hear anything else.

Beckett, who started the Youth concerts for the Boston Symphony orchestra five years ago, after he had played Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms for the young of San Francisco for two years, has just introduced the idea of "grown up" music for young people to the New York Philharmonic orchestra by conducting it in three youth concerts.

"The trouble with most orchestra concerts for young people," Beckett said, "is that the programs are made up of the foam and froth of music, not the real soul-stirring music of the great composers.

Lecture Is Boring

"The boys and girls listen more or less respectfully. But they are bored with the music appreciation lecture which accompanies the concert and find little in the music really to move them. They have never given one which was not for a capacity house of high school students who listened, enjoyed and applauded—is to play the best music of the best composers, to make the program notes brief and the lecture briefer.

"If we do not spread the idea of youth concerts," he warned, "we are going to lose our audiences for the symphony orchestras. The concerts, given by the symphony orchestras, for high school students at reasonable prices, will build up the orchestra audiences of the future.

Interest Future Players

"The concerts should be arranged with cooperation of the board of education, as they were in New York, and directed especially to the music students, but not entirely confined to them."

Beckett said the youth concerts also would stir up the interest of future orchestra players. The supply of future material, he said, is dwindling rapidly.

[71]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Dr. Koussevitzky Scores Triumph in Season's Final Concert

Herald May 7

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 24th concert of its 62d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:
Liadov..."From the Apocalypse," Op. 66
Brahms..Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
Shostakovitch...Symphony No. 5, Op. 47

Yesterday was, as it should be, Dr. Koussevitzky's day. The music was as expected; that is to say, the Liadov was noisily trivial, the Brahms spoke as gratefully as it always does and the Shostakovitch, wearing better than expected, came to a triumphant conclusion with everything but the firing off of cannons and the descent, from the proscenium arch, of the flag of the four freedoms.

It was not only Koussevitzky's day, it was the culmination of Koussevitzky's season, for no man has shown so profound an inward change as he in this his 19th season as conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony. We have had occasion to note this inexplicable growth and development before and have been confounded by it. The exact nature of the flowering of his art escapes definition at the moment; indeed, it may well be of so personal a nature as make discussion of it an impropriety. But it exists none the less, and has brought about a profoundly more spiritual quality in his reading of those works which seem to speak most urgently to him.

It developed yesterday, in all places, in the Shostakovitch. It is plain to be seen that Shostakovitch strikes a remarkably sympathetic chord in Dr. Koussevitzky. Many of us may sit by quite unaffected; wondering in point of fact, how so astute a musician cannot hear its manufactured banalities, its screaming artificialities and its essentially rabble-rousing motivation. This is not to deny it any musical standing whatever for it is striking purely as sound and it has some undeniably bright spots in it.

The first two movements are, it seems to us, far and away the best, and they more than anything else keep it alive. Then along comes that interminable largo and that outrageously tinny finale, and life becomes a husk . . . except that the conductor's vivid conception of it nearly sweeps you off your feet, and though you go protesting, you go along with him. When a conductor can make you do that, you cannot but give him his due. The point is, though, he has never demonstrated his mastery over both orchestra and audience quite so overwhelmingly as he has in the truly memorable programs of this season. Regrettably enough, those memorable programs have been too few for our liking, but they've been frequent enough to prove beyond question when they came along that Dr. Koussevitzky's powers, so far from declining, have actually increased beyond measure.

Inasmuch as it is a well-known phenomenon that the last Brahms you have heard is the best Brahms you have heard, the Fourth seemed greater than ever. It seemed to us that the first movement was not informed with the architectural homogeneity Dr. Koussevitzky usually achieves, and that it went by fits and starts, but the succeeding three movements were miraculously traversed. Although its season has been especially arduous what with the discomfort of its travels, the orchestra, to the last man, deserves the utmost praise for its part in the abundant musical glories, of which by no means the least occurred yesterday. Well aware of its unique fortune in having so prodigious an organization in its midst, the audience gave both orchestra and conductor a prolonged ovation. The season thus came to a

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 2 - 1943

Boston Pops Season Set for Network

Fiedler Will Conduct Orchestra Starting May 8

The world-famous Boston Symphony Pops concerts, for 57 years one of the outstanding musical events in the cultural life of Boston, will be broadcast over the coast-to-coast Blue network including WFCI every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., starting May 8, to the conclusion of the Pops season in mid-July.

Conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, inspired young American who has directed the orchestra during these Pops series since 1930. Milton J. Cross, commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Company broadcasts, and a pioneer announcer in radio, will offer the commentaries during each program.

Interesting to note, is that where the regular winter programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, were the epitome of decorum and pin-drop silence, the Pops concerts are held in an atmosphere of gaiety.

The Pops possess what the critics proclaim "a smooth and happy blending of music and sociability"—light music and what are termed the "light classics," all integrated into a palatable musical dish for the listeners, who will be legion in view of the broadcasting aspect.

For this series of concerts, staid Boston Symphony Hall is given a thorough "going-over," seats being ripped from the floor and tables substituted. Smoking is permitted, whispering encouraged, and waitresses summoned for the inevitable "Pops Punch."

Arthur Fiedler was born in Boston, son of a noted European artist who came to this country to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The parent, Emmanuel Fiedler, was a member of the original Kneisel Quartet.

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
MAY 3 - 1943

Conductor Says Youth Likes "Heavy Music" If It's Good

ENGLEWOOD, N. J., May 2.—(U.P.)—Wheeler Beckett, conductor-composer who has been conducting concerts of "heavy music" for young people for seven years, said "zoot suit" music is popular only because most boys and girls don't have a chance to hear anything else.

Beckett, who started the Youth concerts for the Boston Symphony orchestra five years ago, after he had played Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms for the young of San Francisco for two years, has just introduced the idea of "grown up" music for young people to the New York Philharmonic orchestra by conducting it in three youth concerts.

"The trouble with most orchestra concerts for young people," Beckett said, "is that the programs are made up of the foam and froth of music, not the real soul-stirring music of the great composers.

Lecture Is Boring

"The boys and girls listen more or less respectfully. But they are bored with the music appreciation lecture which accompanies the concert and find little in the music really to move never given one which was not for a capacity house of high school students who listened, enjoyed and applauded—is to play the best music of the best composers, to make the program notes brief and the lecture briefer.

"If we do not spread the idea of youth concerts," he warned, "we are going to lose our audiences for the symphony orchestras. The concerts, given by the symphony orchestras, for high school students at reasonable prices, will build up the orchestra audiences of the future.

Interest Future Players

"The concerts should be arranged with cooperation of the board of education, as they were in New York, and directed especially to the music students, but not entirely confined to them."

Beckett said the youth concerts also would stir up the interest of future orchestra players. The supply of future material, he said, is dwindling rapidly.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE MAY 2, 1943

Courier May 4 '43

Review of the Boston Symphony's 62d Season

Union Agreement and Return to Radio Important Events

The 62d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not especially brilliant but it had a certain amount of excitement. The most important event of the season was, of course, the entrance of the orchestra into the American Federation of Musicians.

Thus far there have been no visible changes wrought upon either the orchestra or its performances by the complete change of status. Whether any will develop remains to be seen. The end of the 62d season finds the Boston Symphony still occupying undisputed its exalted rank of "the best orchestra in the world."

Signing with the union meant, among other things, that the Boston Symphony could return to broadcasting, which it promptly did, and to making records, which no doubt it will do when Mr. Petrillo's differences with the recording companies have been settled.

Few Soloists

Several years ago, as union pressure on the orchestra became heavier, we began to feel the ban upon soloists. Without doubt, the state of uncertainty which must have existed when the 62d season was planned, was the reason we have had so few soloists in 1942-43. Next season, let us hope, this will be different.

Tremendous response from the radio public followed the first broadcast concerts. It was obvious that Boston Symphony broadcasts would immediately become a prime air feature. So they did. And this leads one to the speculation whether, in the future, entire Boston Symphony concerts, instead of the first hour on Saturday evenings, will be available to the radio public. Shutting off a great orchestra like this promptly at 9:15, seems rather small potatoes.

The Summer Berkshire Music Festivals were last year called off for the duration. Nor will the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Koussevitzky's cherished and valuable educational project, be resumed until the war is over.

This means that for the first time in several years the Summer of 1943 will find the Boston Symphony staying right in Boston, for an extended season of Pops and a month of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade.

The New Music

Now what about the new music of 1942-43? Well, the most disputed, publicized, admired and deprecated new work was unquestionably the Seventh, or "Leningrad" Symphony, by Dmitri Shostakovitch. Putting it upon the first program, last October, Serge Koussevitzky made of it a virtuosic tour de force. It seemed magnificent under his ministration. It is no doubt far too long, yet this writer continues to view the Seventh with admiration.

The novelty second in importance was, to this column, the gorgeously colored and the emotionally intense First Symphony of Bohuslav Martinu, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of the late Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky. The main shortcoming of the Symphony seemed to be its weakness of formal structure, very unaccountable in the case of Martinu for, as his chamber works have revealed, he is ordinarily a master of structure.

The derivative 21st Symphony by Miaskovsky, Lopatnikoff's dry Sinfonietta, and Dukelsky's Violin Concerto, a work with a beautifully written solo part and hardly any orchestral background, all had virtues to recommend. But if any turns out to have a long life, I shall be surprised. Dukelsky's work, had, in addition, the benefit of a very fine preparation and performance by the soloist, Ruth Posselt.

before. Once again, thanks to Richard Burgin for unfamiliar Mahler. Some day, let us hope, we shall have the Third entire.

The most important revivals were of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, with the vocal portions omitted; Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead" and Second Symphony (the latter performed in memory of the composer); the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofieff, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist, and Brahms' "A Song of Destiny," admirably sung by the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club. Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" was another rarity, distinguished by the solo work of soprano Marcelle Denya.

The one guest conductor, George Szell, proved a leader of technical skill and assurance and, quite as vital, of temperament and imagination.

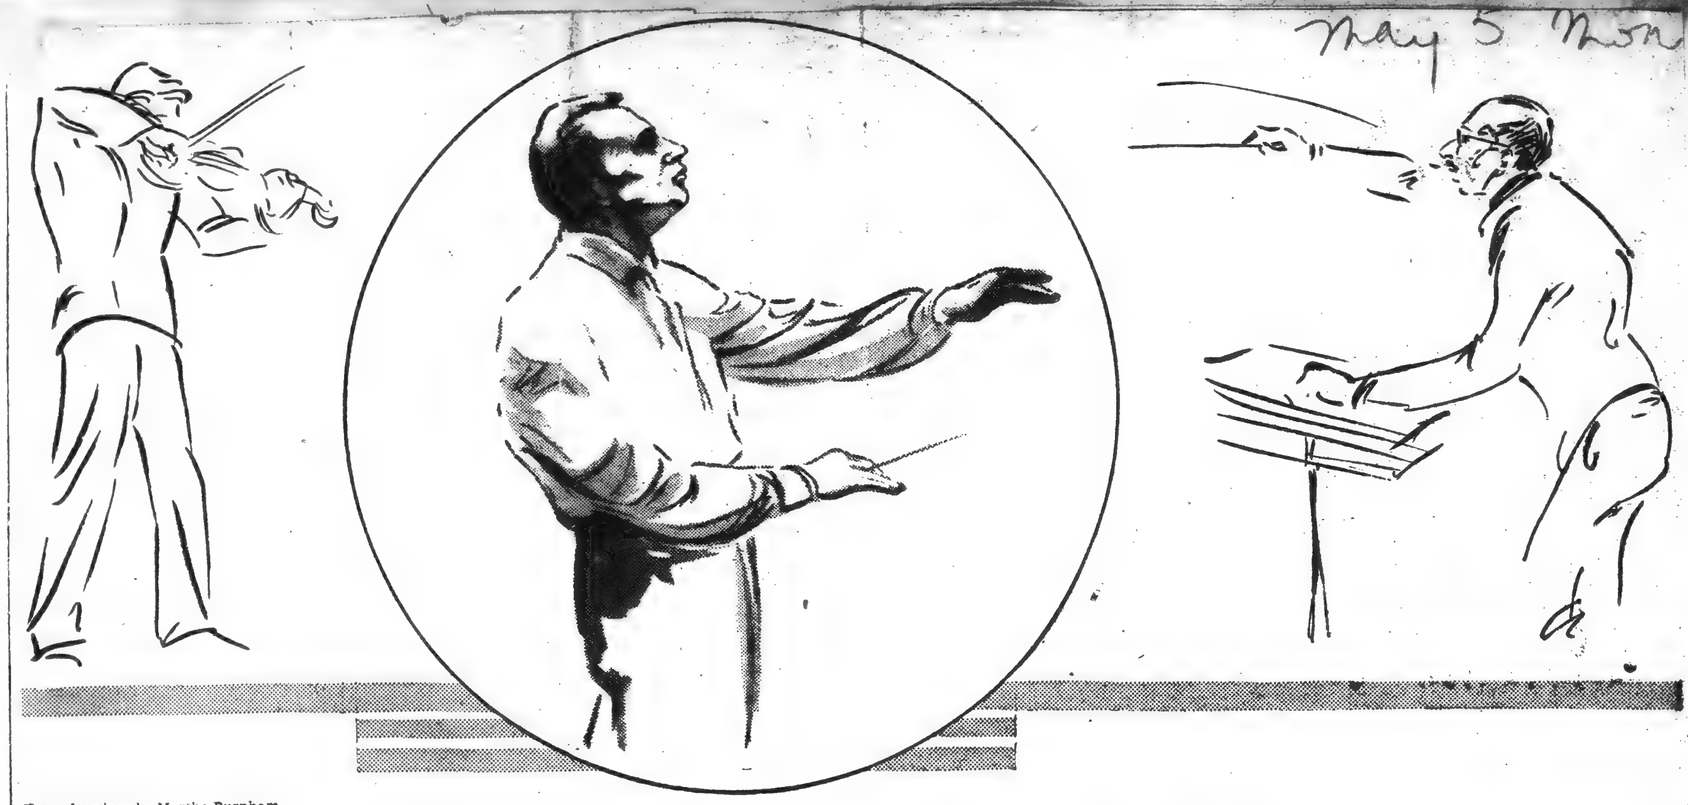
Serge Koussevitzky has now rounded out 19 years as conductor. His re-creative powers have not lessened, even if his programs are steadily shrinking to a circumscribed number of "standard masterpieces." As a great conductor, one of authority and inward comprehension and extraordinary emotional persuasion, he is still a master among masters. C. W. D.

William Schuman's Secular Cantata, "A Free Song," the Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris, and "A Lincoln Portrait" by Aaron Copland all proved engrossing, none without flaws and yet of definite skill and imagination. These three American scores deserve to be heard in future seasons. Mr. Frederick Jacobi's Ode belongs in the same category. A semi-novelty was the orchestral transcription, by guest conductor George Szell, of the E minor Smetana Quartet, "From My Life." It was beautifully scored and made a very good impression.

Unfamiliar Mahler

The first movement of Gustav Mahler's Third Symphony occupied a place all its own for, though hardly new, not a note of this work had been played in Boston

[71]



From drawings by Martha Burnham

Likeness Captured in Few Lines, Emphasis Given to Suggesting Action

Three typical sketches from the notebook of Miss Martha Burnham of Boston, an artist whose special interest is sketching movement, particularly that of musicians at work. The one at the left? Yehudi Menuhin, of course! Who has not seen the musician in this characteristic pose, fairly hidden behind his instrument?

In the circle is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whom Miss Burnham delights to depict in his different musical expressions. This sketch she has subtitled "Dolce! Dolce!" Dr. Koussevitzky in his rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra often achieves tones one would suppose could not be surpassed in a concert, and is himself carried away with the beauty of his men's playing as he exhorts them with "Dolce! Dolce! Singing, gentlemen, make it sing!"

Igor Stravinsky conducting one of his own works is seen at the right. He himself was most enthusiastic about this "action" sketch. Note how the baton seems almost an extension of the arm and how what Miss Burnham calls "progress of movement" is suggested by the hint of curved line just above it.

SODUS, N.Y.
RECORD
5/6/43

GOOD MUSIC IS POPULAR, TOO.

Three sailors rushed eagerly up to the ticket counter at a USO club. No tickets? But they had left their names, they protested. Finally two passes were produced, and the third sailor sighed in disappointment. "Don't you think there'd be room for just one more?" he asked plaintively.

These boys were not begging for tickets to a jam session, a musical show or a movie. What they wanted to hear was a symphony concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, just returned from a concert tour of England for the benefit of war relief, brought back word that there is urgent need to send the highest type of artist to entertain the troops abroad. Authorities are wrong, he asserts, who take it for granted that all the boys want is the lighter type of entertainment.

Mr. Menuhin's statement is corroborated by Miss Winifred Heidt, concert and opera singer, who has just been overseas on a USO camp tour. Miss Heidt reports that at every post she visited groups of young men would gather to talk to her about serious music.

Further testimony—if any is needed—to the hearty appetite of many young Americans for good music may be found in the enthusiasm with which the boys have attended camp concerts by the top-ranking symphony orchestras. In Boston, service men are invited to play in special "classical jam sessions" under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pop Orchestra. They have responded with alacrity to the invitation.

All this calls for more than just a smile of approval. Public support of organizations supplying this type of entertainment for the boys is needed now, and will be needed increasingly as the men are sent to areas remote from civic centres.—Christian Science Monitor.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

MAY 8 - 1943

WEEK-END MUSICAL PROGRAMS

Boston "Pops" Orchestra In First Summer Concert

The famed Boston "Pops" Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard in its first concert of the 1943 summer season at 8:15 p. m., Saturday over WSAI. Milton J. Cross, announcer for the new series, will offer recordings by the "pops" orchestra for the correct answers to music questions to be asked the radio audience during the hour-long concert.

Opening with a medley of patriotic airs including "Halls of Montezuma," "Semper Paratus," "Army Air Corps," "When the Caissons Go Rolling Along" and "God Bless America." Mr. Fiedler will also conduct Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Weber's overture to "Oberon," Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1" and the Johann Strauss "Artist's Life" waltzes.

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

MAY 7 - 1943

ANOTHER forward step in the progress of the wide-awake Blue Network has just been announced. Starting tomorrow, Saturday, May 8, at 5:15 p.m., KGO will broadcast the first in the series of Boston Symphony Pop Concerts. This has, for fifty-seven years, been one of the outstanding musical events of the cultural life of the famous old New England city.

Interesting to note, and of definite historical background, is that where the regular winter programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, were the epitome of decorum and pin-drop silence, the Pop concerts are held in an atmosphere of gaiety and inter-audience sociability. For this series of concerts, staid Boston Symphony Hall is given a thorough "going-over," seats being ripped from the floor and tables substituted. Smoking is permitted, whispering encouraged, and waitresses summoned for the inevitable "Pops Punch."

The Pops possess what the critics proclaim "A smooth and happy blending of music and sociability"—light music and what are termed the "light classics," all integrated into a palatable musical dish for the listeners, who will be legion in view of the broadcasting aspect.

Conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, inspired young American who has directed the orchestra during these Pops series since 1930. Fielder was born in Boston, son of a noted European artist who came to this country to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The parent, Emmanuel Fielder, was a member of the famed original Kneislel Quartet.

Milton J. Cross, commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Company broadcast and a pioneer announcer in radio, will offer the commentaries during each program.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

MAY 8 - 1943

Radio Program Notes:

Boston Pops Begins Series; Music Week

NTSTC Symphony Plays Compositions By Hanson, Barlow

With Maestro Arthur Fielder on the podium, the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra Saturday (KGKO, 7:15 p.m.), will begin an eleven-week series of radiobroadcasts, Saluting America's Armed Forces, the opening program will include Halls of Montezuma, Semper Paratus, Army Air Corps, When the Caissons Go Rolling Along and God Bless America. Concert numbers will be Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance, Weber's Overture to Oberon, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 and Strauss' Artists Life. Milton J. Cross, commentator for the Metropolitan Opera's broadcasts, will be the program's master of ceremonies. . . . Edwin MacArthur will conduct the Southern Symphony Orchestra in a special concert (WFAA, 3 p.m.), at the 1943 Columbia (S.C.) Music Festival

ALTOONA, PA.
MIRROR

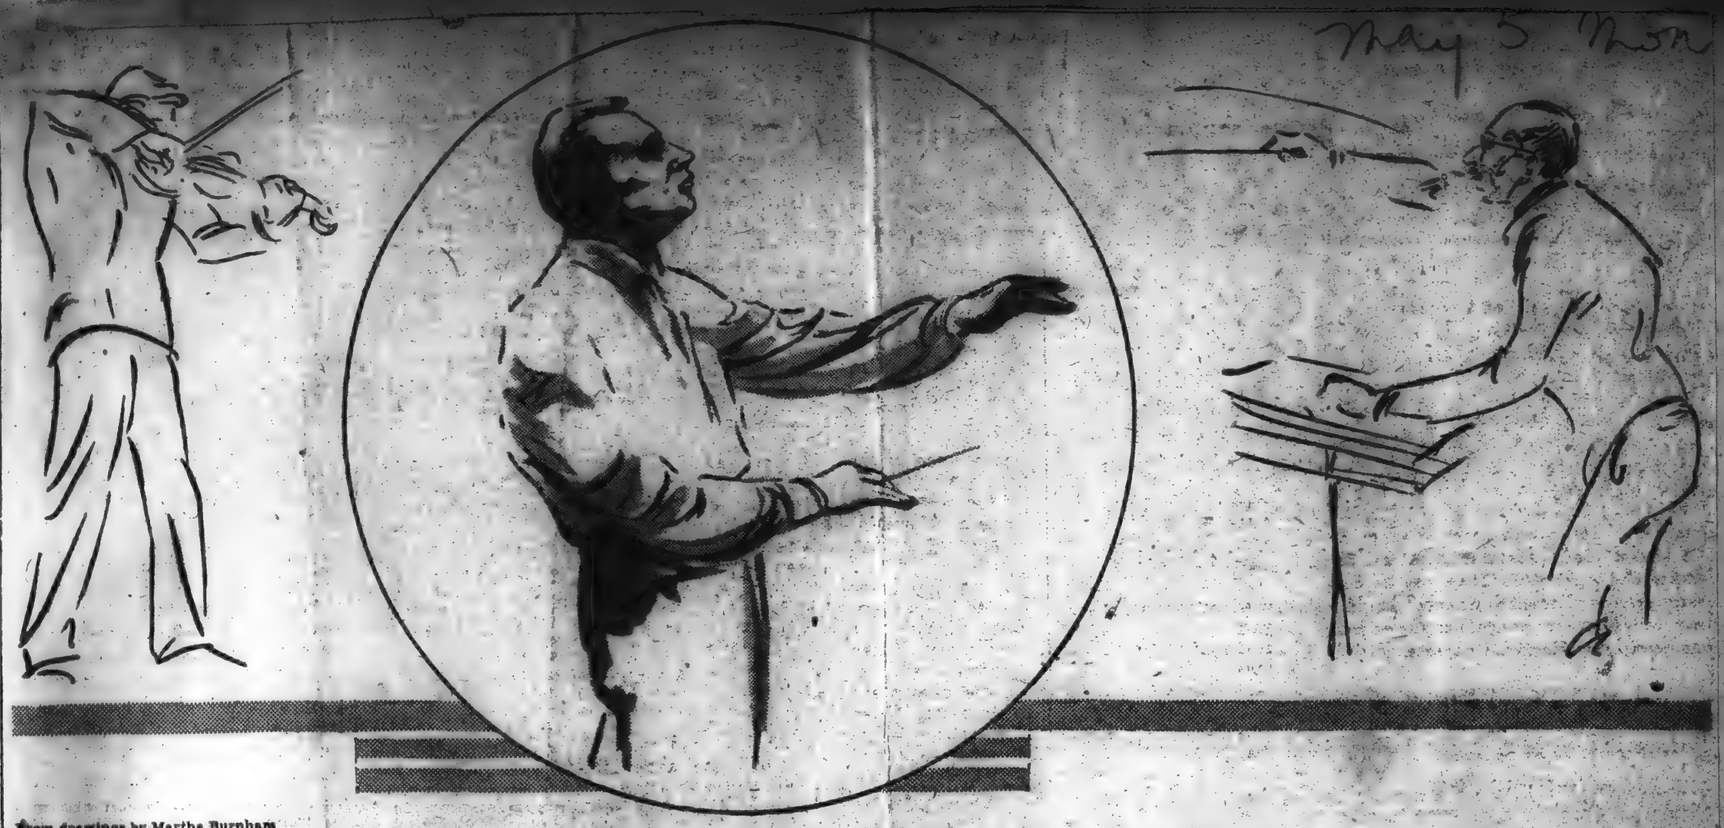
MAY 7 - 1943

BASS CLARINET HITS NEW "LOW"

BOSTON—The bass clarinet has hit a new low note with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano.

Rosario Mazzeo(bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.



From drawings by Martha Burnham

Likeness Captured in Few Lines, Emphasis Given to Suggesting Action

Three typical sketches from the notebook of Miss Martha Burnham of Boston, an artist whose special interest is sketching movement, particularly that of musicians at work. The one at the left? Yehudi Menuhin, of course! Who has not seen the musician in this characteristic pose, fairly hidden behind his instrument?

In the circle is Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, whom Miss Burnham delights to depict in his different musical expressions. This sketch she has subtitled "Dolce! Dolce!" Dr. Koussevitsky in his rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra often achieves tones one would suppose could not be surpassed in a concert, and is himself carried away with the beauty of his men's playing as he exhorts them with "Dolce! Dolce! Singing, gentlemen, make it sing!"

Igor Stravinsky conducting one of his own works is seen at the right. He himself was most enthusiastic about this "action" sketch. Note how the baton seems almost an extension of the arm and how what Miss Burnham calls "progress of movement" is suggested by the hint of curved line just above it.

SODUS, N.Y.
RECORD
5/6/43

GOOD MUSIC IS POPULAR, TOO.

Three sailors rushed eagerly up to the ticket counter at a USO club. No tickets? But they had left their names, they protested. Finally two passes were produced, and the third sailor sighed in disappointment. "Don't you think there'd be room for just one more?" he asked plaintively.

These boys were not begging for tickets to a jam session, a musical show or a movie. What they wanted to hear was a symphony concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yehudi Menuhin, violinist just returned from a concert tour of England for the benefit of war relief, brought back word that there is urgent need to send the highest type of artist to entertain the troops abroad. Authorities are wrong, he asserts, who take it for granted that all the boys want is the lighter type of entertainment.

Mr. Menuhin's statement is corroborated by Miss Winifred Heidt, concert and opera singer, who has just been overseas on a USO camp tour. Miss Heidt reports that at every post she visited groups of young men would gather to talk to her about serious music.

Further testimony—if any is needed—to the hearty appetite of many young Americans for good music may be found in the enthusiasm with which the boys have attended camp concerts by the top-ranking symphony orchestras. In Boston, service men are invited to play in special "classical jam sessions" under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pop Orchestra. They have responded with alacrity to the invitation.

All this calls for more than just a smile of approval. Public support of organizations supplying this type of entertainment for the boys is needed now, and will be needed increasingly as the men are sent to areas remote from civic centres.—Christian Science Monitor.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST
MAY 8 - 1943

WEEK-END MUSICAL PROGRAMS

Boston "Pops" Orchestra In First Summer Concert

The famed Boston "Pops" Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard in its first concert of the 1943 summer season at 8:15 p. m., Saturday over WSAI. Milton J. Cross, announcer for the new series, will offer recordings by the "pops" orchestra for the correct answers to music questions to be asked the radio audience during the hour-long concert.

Opening with a medley of patriotic airs including "Halls of Montezuma," "Semper Paratus," "Army Air Corps," "When the Caissons Go Rolling Along" and "God Bless America." Mr. Fiedler will also conduct Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Weber's overture to "Oberon," Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1" and the Johann Strauss "Artist's Life" waltzes.

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
MAY 7 - 1943

ANOTHER forward step in the progress of the wide-awake Blue Network has just been announced. Starting tomorrow, Saturday, May 8, at 5:15 p.m., KGO will broadcast the first in the series of Boston Symphony Pop Concerts. This has, for fifty-seven years, been one of the outstanding musical events of the cultural life of the famous old New England city.

Interesting to note, and of definite historical background, is that where the regular winter programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, were the epitome of decorum and pin-drop silence, the Pop concerts are held in an atmosphere of gaiety and inter-audience sociability. For this series of concerts, staid Boston Symphony Hall is given a thorough "going-over," seats being ripped from the floor and tables substituted. Smoking is permitted, whispering encouraged, and waitresses summoned for the inevitable "Pops Punch."

The Pops possess what the critics proclaim "A smooth and happy blending of music and sociability"—light music and what are termed the "light classics," all integrated into a palatable musical dish for the listeners, who will be legion in view of the broadcasting aspect.

Conductor will be Arthur Fielder, inspired young American who has directed the orchestra during these Pops series since 1930. Fielder was born in Boston, son of a noted European artist who came to this country to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The parent, Emmanuel Fielder, was a member of the famed original Kneisel Quartet.

Milton J. Cross, commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Company broadcast and a pioneer announcer in radio, will offer the commentaries during each program.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAY 8 - 1943

Radio Program Notes:

Boston Pops Begins Series; Music Week

NTSTC Symphony Plays Compositions By Hanson, Barlow

With Maestro Arthur Fielder on the podium, the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra Saturday (KGKO, 7:15 p.m.), will begin an eleven-week series of radiobroadcasts, Saluting America's Armed Forces, the opening program will include Halls of Montezuma, Semper Paratus, Army Air Corps, When the Caissons Go Rolling Along and God Bless America. Concert numbers will be Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance, Weber's Overture to Oberon, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 and Strauss' Artists Life. Milton J. Cross, commentator for the Metropolitan Opera's broadcasts, will be the program's master of ceremonies. . . . Edwin MacArthur will conduct the Southern Symphony Orchestra in a special concert (WFAA, 3 p.m.), at the 1943 Columbia (S.C.) Music Festival

ALTOONA, PA.
MIRROR
MAY 7 - 1943

BASS CLARINET HITS NEW "LOW"

BOSTON—The bass clarinet has hit a new low note with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano.

Rosario Mazzeo(bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1943

VOICE AWARDS WON BY CINCINNATI GIRL

Nan Merriman Is Only Winner of $1,000 From Federation of Music Clubs

ALSO TAKES OPERA HONOR

Texas Violinist and 2 Women Pianists Get Checks for Best in Their Class

At the victory concert given by the National Federation of Music Clubs for its War Service Fund last night at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Nan Merriman, 23-year-old mezzo-soprano, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was announced as the only winner of a $1,000 award in the organization's biennial Young Artists Auditions held earlier this week at the Biltmore Hotel. Miss Merriman also was declared the winner of the award offered by the New Opera Company in collaboration with the federation, guaranteeing her an appearance next season with the company in one of its productions.

Dr. Walter Damrosch presented the federation's $1,000 check to Miss Merriman, who is a pupil of Lotte Leonard and last June won an award of the Cincinnati Zoo Opera Company entitling her to sing the role of Cieca in a performance of Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," in which she appeared with a cast including Giovanni Martinelli, Stella Roman and Kerstin Thorborg.

No award was made in the male voice classification, but the federation's usual award to those judged best in their respective class were received by Fredell Lack, 21-year-old violinist of Houston, Texas, who was presented with a check for $500, and by Gladys Gladstone of Whipple, Ariz., and Zadel Skolovsky of Boston, Va., pianists, who had tied, and were the recipients of $250 each.

The checks for these awards were presented on the federation's behalf by Edward Johnson, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Association; Mme. Yolanda Meron-Irion, general manager of the New Opera Company, and Ruth Ferry, chairman of the Young Artists Auditions.

Since there were no instrumentalist winners, the customary Schubert Memorial Association's award of an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra by the best instrumentalist was not made.

In the course of the concert Miss Merriman sang the aria O mio Fernando from Donizetti's "La Favorita" and the Habanera from Bizet's "Carmen," with Joseph Teague at the piano. Miss Lack, assisted at the keyboard by Morland Kortkamp, played the first movement of Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," and Miss Gladstone and Mr. Skolovsky were heard respectively in the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 53, and Chopin's "Ballade" in A flat.

The rest of the program was devoted to offerings by the federation's Victory Chorus, composed of 400 women's voices, led by Dr. John Warren Erb, and two groups of songs presented by James Melton, Metropolitan tenor. The program opened with a massing of the colors by a group of Waves and the singing of the national anthem by Mr. Melton, the chorus and the audience.

The jury which selected the award winners at the Young Artists Auditions was composed of Fritz Reiner, Robert Casadesus, George Chavchavadze, Efrem Kurtz, Adolf Busch, Bronsilaw Huberman, Erich Leinsdorf, Elisabeth Schumann, Paul Althouse, Paul Stassevitch, Richard Burgin, Mrs. Eugene Ormandy, Annie Friedberg, Lawrence Evans and Marks Levine. Emil Cooper, conductor, represented the New Opera Company in its award.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAY 13 1943

STOESSEL'S CAREER STARTED IN EUROPE

After Studying in Berlin He Played With Hess Quartet and as Violin Soloist

ORATORIO SOCIETY LEADER

Widely Known Also as Festival Conductor, Composer and Musical Educator

Albert Stoessel was widely known as a violinist and conductor and was especially associated with the Juilliard Graduate School, the Chautauqua Institution and the Oratorio Society of New York. He was director of the opera and orchestra at the Juilliard School, musical director of the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the Oratorio Society.

He was also a composer, some of his compositions being widely played in Europe and this country.

Born in St. Louis in 1894, he studied music as a child in that city and at the age of 15 entered the Royal Academic High School of Music in Berlin as a violin student of Emanuel Wirth and Willy Hess. Upon completing his course at that institution he became a member of the Hess String Quartet and appeared extensively as a soloist in Germany, Holland and Switzerland.

Made Debut Here in 1915

He made his debut as a violinist here in 1915 with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. During the first World War he served as an infantry lieutenant and later as bandmaster of the 301st Infantry Regiment. After the armistice he became director of the A. E. F. bandmaster's school in France. During this period he met Walter Damrosch, who invited him to become assistant director of the Oratorio Society. Thereafter he divided his time between playing and conducting for a number of years. He was assisting artist to Enrico Caruso on his last tour of this country.

When Mr. Damrosch retired as conductor of the Oratorio Society Mr. Stoessel succeeded him, and soon afterward became musical director of the Worcester Festival and the Chautauqua Institution. In 1923 he was invited to establish and head the Music Department of New York University, from which he received a Master's degree.

Mr. Stoessel joined the faculty of the Juilliard Graduate School in 1930 and also took over the directorship of the Westchester County Music Festival for the next five years.

Later Work as Conductor

He restricted his violin playing to the field of chamber music about this time and devoted more of his energies to conducting and teaching. He directed the first complete performance of the B Minor Mass and St. Matthew Passion in this city, and made many appearances as conductor of leading orchestras, including the Boston Symphony. Under his leadership performances of more than twenty-five operas were given at the Juilliard School.

The French Government made him an Officier d'Academie et Instruction Publique with the Silver Palm.

Mr. Stoessel's compositions include "Suite Antique" for Chamber Orchestra; "Cyrano de Bergerac," a symphonic portrait; "A Festival Fanfare," for chorus and orchestra; "Hispania Suite," for orchestra; Concerto Grosso, for strings and piano, and "Garrick," an opera in three acts, completed in 1936.

Besides his widow, the former Julia Pickard, he leaves two sons Edward and Frederick Stoessel.

GOSHEN, IND.
NEWS-DEMOCRAT
MAY 13 1943

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

GRADUAL EMERGENCE OF SHOSTAKOVITCH GAIN FOR MUSIC

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post MAY 9

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE most striking development of the past few orchestral seasons has been the gradual emergence of Dmitri Shostakovitch as a popular symphonist. In these melodically sterile days—and no symphony ever became popular without fetching themes—that is more of an achievement than might be imagined. The last recruit to those particular ranks was Sibelius, and he made the grade many years ago. Indeed, before Shostakovitch came along it was easy to predict that the symphony as an art form was rapidly on the way out. Representative composers were ignoring it, and when they did pay it passing recognition it was always in a work that quickly fell into the category of lesser efforts. Take those of Stravinsky and Hindemith, for example.

It was Stokowski who discovered Shostakovitch over here. When the First Symphony, written before the composer had attained his majority, came out, the Philadelphia conductor pounced upon it, announced the advent of a new and important talent, and made a recording of the piece which soon established itself in the standard repertory. Artur Rodzinski, late of Cleveland, soon to be of New York, quickly got on the bandwagon, but Koussevitzky and Toscanini remained aloof. The latter had been offered his chance at the American premiere of the Fifth Symphony, now the general favorite, and turned it down.

It was the Fifth, introduced here, like the First, by Richard Burgin, that first caught Dr. Koussevitzky's eye, and when he fell he fell hard. The same thing had already happened to him in the case of Sibelius, to whom he had long been completely indifferent. He played the Fifth Symphony frequently, and got quite a lot of publicity for himself and it by getting into a verbal war with the Boston critics. Your humble servant was the first of these to cry "Uncle." The Sixth Symphony intrigued him in the same way, and was good for a quick repetition, and last fall he made the most of the then new Seventh. Always anxious to put his beliefs into words, he rushed into print with the unguarded statement that the young Russian had more real popular appeal than any composer since Beethoven!

In the past season we had Shostakovitch in the first concert (No. 7), in the last concert (No. 6), and in the 11th (No. 6). We had been promised No. 1, the repetition of which is now considerably overdue, but didn't get it. For most people who were not swept off their feet by the avalanche of publicity, the battle-born Seventh or "Leningrad" Symphony was a disappointment. Nor is there yet anything like critical agreement over the merits of the others. (No. 4, it will be recalled, was withdrawn for reasons never fully explained, and the frankly propagandistic Two and Three have never registered here.) Shostakovitch's melodic directness, his occasional resort to what has been called musical "rabble rousing" have made him the butt of the superior, but he can take it. Final judgments are always expressed by the public.

* * * *

Actually a new symphonist is something we badly needed. Ultimately one may weary of Beethoven, Brahms and Tchaikovsky, and in these parts certain symphonies of Sibelius have quite definitely been run into the ground. It is good to see Mahler getting, if slowly, the recognition that had been long denied him. In the past two seasons Mr. Burgin has given us parts of the Fourth and Third, in that order, and revived the First. We can probably count on some Mahler every year. It is Bruckner now who lags behind. For some time Dr. Koussevitzky has got no farther than his annual promises. It is a pity, too, for the basic orchestral repertory stands in increasing need of freshening, and it is symphonies that are its mainstay.

Novel music was relatively scarce this season, but what there was of it was mostly worth hearing. This department extends its preference to the romantic Symphony No. 21 of Miaskovsky; the agreeable First Symphony of Martinu; Hindemith's "Noblissima Visione," despite its palpable derivation from "Mathis der Maler"; Guarnieri's "Abertura Concertante" and Lopatnikoff's spicy Sinfonietta; Dukelsky's Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt); Schuman's cantata, "A Free Song," and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" (Will Greer, reader) were good in spots. Harris' Fifth Symphony showed increased maturity of style and technique, but was not free from the typical Harris quality of striving for something not fully attained. Bennett's "Sights and Sounds" and Jacobi's "Ode" seemed distinctly outmoded, although the latter was comparatively new. Not only the fragment of the Mahler Third counted as a local novelty, but also Mozart's early Piano Concerto in E-flat (Emma Boynet) and Smetana's "From My Life," as orchestrated by Szell, came under that head. In all, 85 works were played, representing 47 composers, of which seven were native-born Americans. But Dukelsky, Hindemith, Lopatinkoff and Martinu have cast their lot with us, as did Loeffler, whose "Pagan Poem" added to the store of romantic music in which the season was so rich—you would have to be pretty conservative to find the present run of Symphony Concerts too "modern."

Friday's final "Symphony Luncheon" at the Copley-Plaza will take the form of a joint recital by Boris Goldovsky, pianist and commentator, and his mother, the distinguished violinist, Lea Luboshutz.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
MAY 12 1943

Compositions Commissioned

BOSTON. (AP)—Awards for symphonic compositions to be written by Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok and William Schuman were approved by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation at its annual meeting, the foundation announced today.

[73]

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 194

NATION HEARS "POPS"—After a six years' absence from the airways, Boston's celebrated Pops concerts will return to radio Saturday in a coast-to-coast "music spotting" contest. Conductor Arthur Fiedler is shown with some of the 10,000 letters attesting the program's popularity throughout the land.

3 Composers Are Named For Koussevitzky Award

Stravinsky, Bartok, Schuman Get Symphonic Grants

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

MAY 14 1943

Fresh Honor Won By Composer at Eastman School

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS

MAY 15 1943

Koussevitzky Foundation Authorizes Awards

THE Koussevitzky Music Foundation, founded in 1942 in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, approved at its recent annual meeting awards for symphonic compositions to be written by Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok and William Schuman. The foundation also authorized grants for chamber music compositions by two young American composers, William Bergsma, now at the Eastman School of Music, and Robert M. Palmer, an instructor at the University of Kansas.

Directors authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorski.

These are the second series of grants by the foundation. Last year, grants were made to Bohuslav Martinu, whose commissioned symphony was played with great success this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York, to Nicolai Berezowsky, whose new symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony this Fall and to Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten, both of whom are working on new operas.

Music Notes

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 16 1943

MUSICAL HIGHBROWS NUMEROUS NOW FAN MAIL PROVES

MORE THAN 10,000 WROTE TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THERE is nothing remarkable about radio fan mail, as such, but the 10,000-odd letters received by Symphony Hall since the Boston Symphony went on the air late in December have a very special interest. They prove that musical culture is widely diffused both in this country and in Canada, or in blunter terms, that there are plenty of musical highbrows in localities where you would least expect to find them.

Thanks to the radio and to what was once derisively described as "canned music" it is possible today to have a wide and deep acquaintance with symphonic pieces of all degrees and kinds; with opera, chamber music and the literature of song. Several of these correspondents stated that they had become acquainted with the Boston Symphony through its recordings and were pleased to discover that it sounded just as well over the air. One or two went so far as to declare that they had suspected that the records had been doctored.

There are those who seriously doubt the value of programme notes. It is perfectly true that a great many concert-goers appear to disregard them and sit complacently with their programme books unopened, ignoring alike the texts of songs and choruses and the "argument" in the case of programme music. Such individuals have not learned how to listen and they must be left to enjoy their half-pleasures. Anyway, an overwhelming majority of the 10,000 letter and postcard writers now under discussion asked for the explanatory leaflet with notes on forthcoming programmes, available at a nominal cost.

A great many of these communications have been marked with the letter Q for query—it might as well have been R for request—and these are the ones in which musical preferences are expressed. Some say "let us have the classics" or "none of this modern stuff." Others, more broad-minded, wish to be informed as to what is going on today. Several mention the composer they wish to hear rather than specific works. Beethoven and Tchaikovsky are especially favored in such instances. One correspondent asked for "all of Strauss," while a Southern clergyman said that he and his associates wanted 18th century music and Mahler!

The really surprising thing was that almost nobody asked for the wrong sort of music, though there were requests for works not in the orchestra's repertory, such as Bruckner's Sixth Symphony and Mahler's Sixth and Seventh, or for pieces that have gone long unheard at Symphony Hall, for example, the Symphony of Hermann Goetz, Wolf's "Penthesilea," Reger's Boecklin tone poems, the Ninth of Bruckner. There was one letter that asked for Suppe's "Pique Dame" Overture and the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," items to be referred to Arthur Fiedler, and another that put in a bid for Paderewski's Minuet, the Overture to "The Barber of Seville" and "lots of operatic selections."

Among the other composers wanted were Shostakovitch and Sibelius. Some people liked the former's Sixth Symphony, heard in the second concert, others did not. And this is what you might expect. One fellow wished to hear Balakirev and Cui. There is virtually nothing available from the latter, of course, and what little there is of the former has not been played here in years. Unusual items noted in a batch of these letters the other day were Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake," d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, Bruckner's Seventh, Schumann's Second and the orchestral transcription (is there such a thing?) of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Sonata, a name sometimes given to Opus 28. On the negative side was a plea for "no Harris, Schuman or Virgil Thomson."

A Japanese writing from an internment camp said that while the elder Japanese in this country had not acquired a taste for western music most of the younger generation wanted it. Many, by the way, were the letters from men in armed forces both in this country and Canada.

* * * * *

Speaking of William Shuman, that able American composer is one of three commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to write a symphonic work. The others are Igor Stravinsky and Bela Bartok. Two more Americans, William Bergsma and Robert M. Palmer, were commissioned to write each a piece of chamber music. The directors of the Foundation authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorsky. The above constitute the second series of grants by the Foundation, established in 1942 as a memorial to Natalie Koussevitzky. The first fruits of this benevolence were the Symphony of Martinu, one of the successes of the past season, and a Symphony by Berezowsky, announced for performance and then withdrawn. It will be heard in the autumn. Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten are at work on commissioned operas.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

THIS EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture on Three Greek Themes, Op. 3 ..... Glasounov
Dance of the Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" ..... Gluck
Variations on a Dutch Theme, for String Orchestra ..... Langendoen
Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 .... Grieg
Soloist: Ezon Petri
United Nations Anthem ..... Langendoen
Streets of Pekin (Chinese Impressions) ..... Hadley
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn ..... Valerius
New China March ..... Gould

MONDAY

March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
"Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" ..... Arranged by Poehon
Procession of Bacchus, from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Carmen," Fantasia ..... Bizet
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
"Showboat," Selection ..... Kern
Turkey in the Straw ..... Guion
March, "Boston Commandery" ..... Carter

TUESDAY

March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" .. Smetana
"Molly on the Shore" ..... Percy Grainger
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasy ..... Saint-Saens
Pianos: Jesus Maria Sanroma, Lee Litwin
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Arranged by Sanford
"Brazil," Samba, from "Saludos Amigos" ..... Barroso-Gould
American Patrol ..... Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tchaikovsky
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ... Pierne
Dance of the Buffoons, from "Snow Maiden" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Minuet and Carillon, from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute ..... Morton Gould
Finale of the Symphony No. 5 ... Shostakovitch
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes .. Strauss
"Night and Day" ..... Porter
March, "Only One Vienna" ..... Schrammel

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 194

NATION HEARS "POPS"—After a six years' absence from the airways, Boston's celebrated Pops concerts will return to radio Saturday in a coast-to-coast "music spotting" contest. Conductor Arthur Fiedler is shown with some of the 10,000 letters attesting the program's popularity throughout the land.

3 Composers Are Named For Koussevitzky Award

Stravinsky, Bartok, Schuman Get Symphonic Grants

From Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
MAY 14 1943

Fresh Honor Won By Comp[illegible]rt [illegible]ol

[illegible] one of two chosen for grants for chamber music compositions. The other was Robert M. Palmer, an instructor at the University of Kansas. Bergsma recently won the Joseph H. Bearnes prize, awarded annually by Columbia University, his String Quartet No. 1 being considered the best composition by an American composer between the ages of 18 and 25 years.

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation was founded last year in memory of Natalia Koussevitzky, wife of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. Directors of the foundation authorizing the awards include Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School.

From Clipping From BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAY 16 1943

MUSICAL HIGHBROWS NUMEROUS NOW FAN MAIL PROVES

MORE THAN 10,000 WROTE TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THERE is nothing remarkable about radio fan mail, as such, but the 10,000-odd letters received by Symphony Hall since the Boston Symphony went on the air late in December have a very special interest. They prove that musical culture is widely diffused both in this country and in Canada, or in blunter terms, that there are plenty of musical highbrows in localities where you would least expect to find them.

Thanks to the radio and to what was once derisively described as "canned music" it is possible today to have a wide and deep acquaintance with symphonic pieces of all degrees and kinds; with opera, chamber music and the literature of song. Several of these correspondents stated that they had become acquainted with the Boston Symphony through its recordings and were pleased to discover that it sounded just as well over the air. One or two went so far as to declare that they had suspected that the records had been doctored.

There are those who seriously doubt the value of programme notes. It is perfectly true that a great many concert-goers appear to disregard them and sit complacently with their programme books unopened, ignoring alike the texts of songs and choruses and the "argument" in the case of programme music. Such individuals have not learned how to listen and they must be left to enjoy their half-pleasures. Anyway, an overwhelming majority of the 10,000 letter and postcard writers now under discussion asked for the explanatory leaflet with notes on forthcoming programmes, available at a nominal cost.

A great many of these communications have been marked with the letter Q for query—it might as well have been R for request—and these are the ones in which musical preferences are expressed. Some say "let us have the classics" or "none of this modern stuff." Others, more broad-minded, wish to be informed as to what is going on today. Several mention the composer they wish to hear rather than specific works. Beethoven and Tchaikovsky are especially favored in such instances. One correspondent asked for "all of Strauss," while a Southern clergyman said that he and his associates wanted 18th century music and Mahler!

The really surprising thing was that almost nobody asked for the wrong sort of music, though there were requests for works not in the orchestra's repertory, such as Bruckner's Sixth Symphony and Mahler's Sixth and Seventh, or for pieces that have gone long unheard at Symphony Hall, for example, the Symphony of Hermann Goetz, Wolf's "Penthesilea," Reger's Boecklin tone poems, the Ninth of Bruckner. There was one letter that asked for Suppe's "Pique Dame" Overture and the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," items to be referred to Arthur Fiedler, and another that put in a bid for Paderewski's Minuet, the Overture to "The Barber of Seville" and "lots of operatic selections."

Among the other composers wanted were Shostakovitch and Sibelius. Some people liked the former's Sixth Symphony, heard in the second concert, others did not. And this is what you might expect. One fellow wished to hear Balakirev and Cui. There is virtually nothing available from the latter, of course, and what little there is of the former has not been played here in years. Unusual items noted in a batch of these letters the other day were Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake," d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, Bruckner's Seventh, Schumann's Second and the orchestral transcription (is there such a thing?) of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Sonata, a name sometimes given to Opus 28. On the negative side was a plea for "no Harris, Schuman or Virgil Thomson."

A Japanese writing from an internment camp said that while the elder Japanese in this country had not acquired a taste for western music most of the younger generation wanted it. Many, by the way, were the letters from men in armed forces both in this country and Canada.

* * * *

Speaking of William Shuman, that able American composer is one of three commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to write a symphonic work. The others are Igor Stravinsky and Bela Bartok. Two more Americans, William Bergsma and Robert M. Palmer, were commissioned to write each a piece of chamber music. The directors of the Foundation authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorsky. The above constitute the second series of grants by the Foundation, established in 1942 as a memorial to Natalie Koussevitzky. The first fruits of this benevolence were the Symphony of Martinu, one of the successes of the past season, and a Symphony by Berezowsky, announced for performance and then withdrawn. It will be heard in the autumn. Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten are at work on commissioned operas.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

THIS EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture on Three Greek Themes, Op. 3 ..... Glazounuv
Dance of the Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" ..... Gluck
Variations on a Dutch Theme, for String Orchestra ..... Langendoen
Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 ..... Grieg
Soloist: Egon Petri
United Nations Anthem ..... Langendoen
Streets of Pekin (Chinese Impressions) ..... Hadley
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn ..... Valerius
New China March ..... Gould

MONDAY

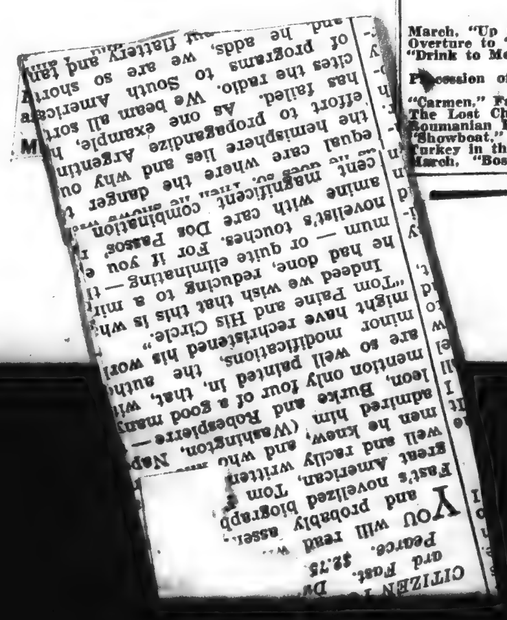
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
"Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" ..... Arranged by Poehon
Procession of Bacchus, from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Carmen," Fantasia ..... Bizet
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
"Showboat," Selection ..... Kern
Turkey in the Straw ..... Guion
March, "Boston Commandery" ..... Carter

TUESDAY

March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" ..... Smetana
"Molly on the Shore" ..... Percy Grainger
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasy ..... Saint-Saens
Pianos: Jesus Maria Sanroma, Leo Litwin
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Arranged by Sanford
"Brazil," Samba, from "Saludos Amigos" ..... Barroso-Gould
American Patrol ..... Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tchaikovsky
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ..... Pierne
Dance of the Buffoons, from "Snow Maiden" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Minuet and Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute ..... Morton Gould
Finale of the Symphony No. 5 ..... Shostakovitch
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes ..... Strauss
"Night and Day" ..... Porter
March, "Only One Vienna" ..... Schrammel



INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 194

NATION HEARS "POPS"—After a six years' absence from the airways, Boston's celebrated Pops concerts will return to radio Saturday in a coast-to-coast "music spotting" contest. Conductor Arthur Fiedler is shown with some of the 10,000 letters attesting the program's popularity throughout the lan

3 Composers Are Named For Koussevitzky Award

Stravinsky, Bartok, Schuman Get Symphonic Grants

Stravinsky, [illegible]Bartok & [illegible]iam Schuman[illegible] the co[illegible] selected by [illegible]s-sevitzky [illegible]sic Founda[illegible] its annual meeting to be t[illegible]cipients of the symphonic composition award, it was announced yesterday. May 13 Bos

Two young American composers, William Bergsma, now at the Eastman School of Music, and Robert Palmer, an instructor at the University of Kansas, are to receive grants for chamber music compositions.

The society was founded in 1942 in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. The directors of the foundation authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorsky.

This is the second series of foundation grants. Last year awards were made to Bohuslav Martinu, whose commissioned symphony was played this season by the Boston Symphony here and in Boston; to Nicolai Berezowsky, whose new symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this autumn, and to Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten, both of whom are working on new operas.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAY 16 1943

MUSICAL HIGHBROWS NUMEROUS NOW FAN MAIL PROVES

MORE THAN 10,000 WROTE TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THERE is nothing remarkable about radio fan mail, as such, but the 10,000-odd letters received by Symphony Hall since the Boston Symphony went on the air late in December have a very special interest. They prove that musical culture is widely diffused both in this country and in Canada, or in blunter terms, that there are plenty of musical highbrows in localities where you would least expect to find them.

Thanks to the radio and to what was once derisively described as "canned music" it is possible today to have a wide and deep acquaintance with symphonic pieces of all degrees and kinds; with opera, chamber music and the literature of song. Several of these correspondents stated that they had become acquainted with the Boston Symphony through its recordings and were pleased to discover that it sounded just as well over the air. One or two went so far as to declare that they had suspected that the records had been doctored.

There are those who seriously doubt the value of programme notes. It is perfectly true that a great many concert-goers appear to disregard them and sit complacently with their programme books unopened, ignoring alike the texts of songs and choruses and the "argument" in the case of programme music. Such individuals have not learned how to listen and they must be left to enjoy their half-pleasures. Anyway, an overwhelming majority of the 10,000 letter and postcard writers now under discussion asked for the explanatory leaflet with notes on forthcoming programmes, available at a nominal cost.

A great many of these communications have been marked with the letter Q for query—it might as well have been R for request—and these are the ones in which musical preferences are expressed. Some say "let us have the classics" or "none of this modern stuff." Others, more broad-minded, wish to be informed as to what is going on today. Several mention the composer they wish to hear rather than specific works. Beethoven and Tchaikovsky are especially favored in such instances. One correspondent asked for "all of Strauss," while a Southern clergyman said that he and his associates wanted 18th century music and Mahler!

The really surprising thing was that almost nobody asked for the wrong sort of music, though there were requests for works not in the orchestra's repertory, such as Bruckner's Sixth Symphony and Mahler's Sixth and Seventh, or for pieces that have gone long unheard at Symphony Hall, for example, the Symphony of Hermann Goetz, Wolf's "Penthesilea," Reger's Boecklin tone poems, the Ninth of Bruckner. There was one letter that asked for Suppe's "Pique Dame" Overture and the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda," items to be referred to Arthur Fiedler, and another that put in a bid for Paderewski's Minuet, the Overture to "The Barber of Seville" and "lots of operatic selections."

Among the other composers wanted were Shostakovitch and Sibelius. Some people liked the former's Sixth Symphony, heard in the second concert, others did not. And this is what you might expect. One fellow wished to hear Balakirev and Cui. There is virtually nothing available from the latter, of course, and what little there is of the former has not been played here in years. Unusual items noted in a batch of these letters the other day were Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake," d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Reger's Variations on a Theme of Mozart, Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, Bruckner's Seventh, Schumann's Second and the orchestral transcription (is there such a thing?) of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Sonata, a name sometimes given to Opus 28. On the negative side was a plea for "no Harris, Schuman or Virgil Thomson."

A Japanese writing from an internment camp said that while the elder Japanese in this country had not acquired a taste for western music most of the younger generation wanted it. Many, by the way, were the letters from men in armed forces both in this country and Canada.

* * * * *

Speaking of William Shuman, that able American composer is one of three commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to write a symphonic work. The others are Igor Stravinsky and Bela Bartok. Two more Americans, William Bergsma and Robert M. Palmer, were commissioned to write each a piece of chamber music. The directors of the Foundation authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorsky. The above constitute the second series of grants by the Foundation, established in 1942 as a memorial to Natalie Koussevitzky. The first fruits of this benevolence were the Symphony of Martinu, one of the successes of the past season, and a Symphony by Berezowsky, announced for performance and then withdrawn. It will be heard in the autumn. Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten are at work on commissioned operas.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

THIS EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture on Three Greek Themes, Op. 3 ..... Glazounov
Dance of the Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus" ..... Gluck
Variations on a Dutch Theme, for String Orchestra ..... Langendoen
Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 ..... Grieg
Soloist: Egon Petri
United Nations Anthem ..... Langendoen
Streets of Pekin (Chinese Impressions) ..... Hadley
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn ..... Valerius
New China March ..... Gould

MONDAY

March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
"Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" ..... Arranged by Poehon
Procession of Bacchus, from "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Carmen," Fantasia ..... Bizet
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 ..... Enesco
"Showboat," Selection ..... Kern
Turkey in the Straw ..... Guion
March, "Boston Commandery" ..... Carter

TUESDAY

March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" ..... Smetana
"Molly on the Shore" ..... Percy Grainger
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasy ..... Saint-Saens
Pianos: Jesus Maria Sanroma, Leo Litwin
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Arranged by Sanford
"Brazil," Samba, from "Saludos Amigos" ..... Barroso-Gould
American Patrol ..... Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tchaikovsky
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ..... Pierne
Dance of the Buffoons, from "Snow Maiden" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Minuet and Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," American Salute ..... Morton Gould
Finale of the Symphony No. 5 ..... Shostakovitch
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes ..... Strauss
"Night and Day" ..... Porter
March, "Only One Vienna" ..... Schrammel

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)

MAY 16 1943

MUSIC GROUP PLANS SYMPHONY SERIES

Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Orchestra Concerts Will Meet Tomorrow

The Spring meeting of the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts will be held tomorrow afternoon at the home of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, 31 Grace Court. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will speak.

The committee will discuss plans for the 1943-44 Brooklyn subscription season. Concert dates have been announced by Mrs. Davenport, the executive secretary, as Nov. 19, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, March 10 and March 31.

The five concerts will be held in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The concert series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

MAY 16 1943

Gabriel Faure is a composer whose works are neglected in the orchestral repertoire, for reasons which we cannot understand. Distinguished by virile originality and poetic sensitivity, Faure's music bears the stamp of perfection usually attributed to Debussy's masterpieces. Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony orchestra in a fine recording of the composer's "Incidental Music to Pelleas et Melisande," just released by Victor.

Koussevitzky has long been distinguished by his sympathetic understanding of the French school of music, and the rich, warm performance of this work by the Bostonians emphasizes his appreciation for the gossamer themes of French music. An exquisite work has been given a delightful performance and a worthy recording. The album also includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Dubinushka," which is given an extremely piquant orchestration in this performance.

* * *

This Clipping From
MOTION PICTURE DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAY 18 1943

Wood Commissions Roy Harris to Write A Sixth Symphony

Mark Woods, the president of the Blue Network, has commissioned Roy Harris, who was the first to write an accredited United States fifth symphony, to compose a sixth symphony for the web. The announcement followed a conference between Woods, Harris and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present the new work next spring.

Woods, who was instrumental in signing the Boston Orchestra to an exclusive long term contract with the Blue, said that he was commissioning the new symphony as a result of the splendid response, both here and abroad, to the world premiere of the Harris Fifth Symphony, which was dedicated by the composer to the people of the Soviet Union, and was first played by the Boston Symphony on February 27.

After the initial broadcast performance of the Fifth, the OWI received a record number of requests for overseas broadcasts of the work, 11 in one week. Recordings were also sent at the request of the British and Russian governments for their own broadcasting systems.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAY 18 1943

Network Commissions New Harris Symphony

The Blue Network has commissioned Roy Harris, the 45-year-old Oklahoma-born composer, to write his Sixth Symphony, Mark Woods, president, announces. This marks the first time a network has commissioned a major symphonic work. The new symphony will have its premiere next Spring with the Boston Symphony conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston is under exclusive long-term contract to the Blue.

The decision to commission the writing of the symphony was reached following a conference between Woods, Harris and Koussevitzky. Mr. Woods expressed the hope that just as the composer's Fifth Symphony was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union, the new work would be dedicated to the fighting forces of the U. S. Mr. Harris said that he was planning to write a choral Symphony based on the Lincoln era as being significant today in time of war.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

MAY 18 1943

Broadcast by all networks of Prime Minister Winston Churchill's second address to a joint session of Congress at 12:30 p. m. tomorrow also is to be world-wide by means of short wave facilities. There also is to be simultaneous relay in the British Isles. The schedule calls for half an hour.

Composer Roy Harris has been commissioned by the Blue network through its president, Mark Woods, to write his sixth symphony, the theme of which is to be based on the Lincoln era. It will be given its premiere by the Boston symphony on the Blue.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 19 1943

HAWTHORNE PINES AT LENOX WRECKED BY HEAVY WIND

Twister Destroys 28 of Them —Snaps Tops Off 30 Trees at Pinecroft — Damage at Tanglewood

Pittsfield, May 18—Twenty-eight of the historic Hawthorne pines on Hawthorne avenue at Lenox were destroyed in last night's miniature tornado, which also blew over or snapped off the tops of 30 of the tallest pines at Pinecroft, the Lenox estate of Charles R. Blakely of New York city. The famous Hawthorne trees were immortalized by the novelist when he wrote in one of his diaries, kept during his Lenox sojourn of three years from 1850: "After loitering awhile on the shores of the lake we strolled through the wood among the tall pillars of those primeval pines and thence home along the margin of the swamp."

Hawthorne at that time was a tenant in a little red cottage located on what is now Tanglewood, owned by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This cottage was burned in June, 1900. For more than 60 years Hawthorne avenue has been a favorite drive for Lenox visitors.

Pinecroft Damage

Almost as widely known have been the Pinecroft pines. Mr Blakely said tonight the trees ruined were from 120 to 140 feet high and from two to three feet in diameter. They have long been known as the "Cathedral pines."

Huge trees also were blown over at Highwood, the estate of Mrs William Norton Bullard, where windows were broken at her home and also at Ventfort hall, the estate of the late Mrs W. Roscoe Bonsal, and at Tanglewood. Traffic was blocked on the Lenox-Stockbridge highway at Brook farm, the summer home of Rev Dr Anson Phelps Stokes.

Charles J. Galvin, Berkshire county state forest fire inspector, and Ocar Hutchinson, Lenox fire chief, inspected the centers of the damage caused by the worst twister that has hit Lenox in many years.

Brockton, Mass.
Enterprise

MAY 20 1943

Press Comment of the Hour

Making Music Under a Master.

(Providence Journal.)

Serge Koussevitzky, the famous conductor, conducted a critique before 1200 students the other day. A 100-piece orchestra played. A student conductor conducted. Mr. Koussevitzky sat in the front row with a microphone between his knees. Mr. Petrillo evidently hadn't said no, and everything was dandy.

And what do you think was the first thing Mr. Koussevitzky did? Stopped the orchestra. Stopped it cold. Advanced on it gesticulating and said this wouldn't do. It wouldn't do at all. For the musicians hadn't tuned up.

We're delighted at this. For though we are not as naive as the Oriental potentate who insisted on having "that first piece" repeated, we do like the tuning up tremendously. It is different from Shostakovitch, of course. In many ways it differs from most of the moderns. For one thing, its chaotic drift is less ominous. For another, it is always pastoral, like tipsy shepherds at a fair without their wives.

It has a way of gathering volume without gathering headway, voltage without amperage. Just when a program note—one of the good, old-fashioned notes which told all—might get ready to note: "This is a passage of great joy and deep spiritual insight marked by under-currents of sadness and a streak of insanity," it suddenly isn't any such thing, and there's nobody blowing but the oboe, the lovely, plaintive, far-off oboe.

The flutes curl in, the bassoon croaks, the fiddles ripple lightly, a French horn bubbles, the piccolo chirps, and the kettle drums thump while the drummer bends in ecstasy to hear. It is delightful. And by far the most subtle piece on the program, for through the chaos one mighty purpose runs, one dominating and insistent note which holds the very secret of the evening's success.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAY 23 1943

EMINENT Conductor Serge Koussevitzky will appear here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season in two concerts under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn.

CANTON, N.Y.
ADVERTISER
5/25/43

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

MAY 18 1943

Harris to Compose 6th Symphony

Dr. Roy Harris, whose resignation as composer in residence at Cornell University was made public Monday, has been commissioned to compose his sixth symphony by Mark Woods, president of the BLU network.

The announcement followed a conference among Woods, Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present the new work in the spring. Mr. Woods said he was commissioning the new symphony as a result of the splendid response, both here and abroad, to the world premiere of Harris' Fifth Symphony which was played on Feb. 27.

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, yet which would be significant today, in time of war, as it was during the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 9 1943

* *

Roy Harris to Use Lincoln Era Events As Symphony Theme

Roy Harris, American composer, has been commissioned by the Blue network to compose his sixth symphony, the theme of which is to be based on the Lincoln era. Harris announced that he would begin work on the composition shortly in his home near Colorado Springs, Col.

The work is to be given its première by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor some time next spring. It will be broadcast. Dr. Koussevitzky has proclaimed Harris' third symphony "the first great American symphony."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)

MAY 16 1943

MUSIC GROUP PLANS SYMPHONY SERIES

Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Orchestra Concerts Will Meet Tomorrow

The Spring meeting of the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts will be held tomorrow afternoon at the home of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, 31 Grace Court. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will speak.

The committee will discuss plans for the 1943-44 Brooklyn subscription season. Concert dates have been announced by Mrs. Davenport, the executive secretary, as Nov. 19, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, March 10 and March 31.

The five concerts will be held in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The concert series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

MAY 16 1943

Gabriel Faure is a composer whose works are neglected in the orchestral repertoire, for reasons which we cannot understand. Distinguished by virile originality and poetic sensitivity, Faure's music bears the stamp of perfection usually attributed to Debussy's masterpieces. Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony orchestra in a fine recording of the composer's "Incidental Music to Pelleas et Melisande," just released by Victor.

Koussevitzky has long been distinguished by his sympathetic understanding of the French school of music, and the rich, warm performance of this work by the Bostonians emphasizes his appreciation for the gossamer themes of French music. An exquisite work has been given a delightful performance and a worthy recording. The album also includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Dubinushka," which is given an extremely piquant orchestration in this performance.

MOTION PICTURE DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAY 18 1943

Wood Commissions Roy Harris to Write A Sixth Symphony

Mark Woods, the president of the Blue Network, has commissioned Roy Harris, who was the first to write an accredited United States fifth symphony, to compose a sixth symphony for the web. The announcement followed a conference between Woods, Harris and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present the new work next spring.

Woods, who was instrumental in signing the Boston Orchestra to an exclusive long term contract with the Blue, said that he was commissioning the new symphony as a result of the splendid response, both here and abroad, to the world premiere of the Harris Fifth Symphony, which was dedicated by the composer to the people of the Soviet Union, and was first played by the Boston Symphony on February 27.

After the initial broadcast performance of the Fifth, the OWI received a record number of requests for overseas broadcasts of the work, 11 in one week. Recordings were also sent at the request of the British and Russian governments for their own broadcasting systems.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAY 18 1943

Network Commissions New Harris Symphony

The Blue Network has commissioned Roy Harris, the 45-year-old Oklahoma-born composer, to write his Sixth Symphony, Mark Woods, president, announces. This marks the first time a network has commissioned a major symphonic work. The new symphony will have its premiere next Spring with the Boston Symphony conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston is under exclusive long-term contract to the Blue.

The decision to commission the writing of the symphony was reached following a conference between Woods, Harris and Koussevitzky. Mr. Woods expressed the hope that just as the composer's Fifth Symphony was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union, the new work would be dedicated to the fighting forces of the U. S. Mr. Harris said that he was planning to write a choral Symphony based on the Lincoln era as being significant today in time of war.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

MAY 18 1943

Broadcast by all networks of Prime Minister Winston Churchill's second address to a joint session of Congress at 12:30 p. m. tomorrow also is to be world-wide by means of short wave facilities. There also is to be simultaneous relay in the British Isles. The schedule calls for half an hour.

Composer Roy Harris has been commissioned by the Blue network through its president, Mark Woods, to write his sixth symphony, the theme of which is to be based on the Lincoln era. It will be given its premiere by the Boston symphony on the Blue.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 19 1943

HAWTHORNE PINES AT LENOX WRECKED BY HEAVY WIND

Twister Destroys 28 of Them —Snaps Tops Off 30 Trees at Pinecroft — Damage at Tanglewood

Pittsfield, May 18—Twenty-eight of the historic Hawthorne pines on Hawthorne avenue at Lenox were destroyed in last night's miniature tornado, which also blew over or snapped off the tops of 30 of the tallest pines at Pinecroft, the Lenox estate of Charles R. Blakely of New York city. The famous Hawthorne trees were immortalized by the novelist when he wrote in one of his diaries, kept during his Lenox sojourn of three years from 1850: "After loitering awhile on the shores of the lake we strolled through the wood among the tall pillars of those primeval pines and thence home along the margin of the swamp."

Hawthorne at that time was a tenant in a little red cottage located on what is now Tanglewood, owned by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This cottage was burned in June, 1900. For more than 60 years Hawthorne avenue has been a favorite drive for Lenox visitors.

Pinecroft Damage

Almost as widely known have been the Pinecroft pines. Mr Blakely said tonight the trees ruined were from 120 to 140 feet high and from two to three feet in diameter. They have long been known as the "Cathedral pines."

Huge trees also were blown over at Highwood, the estate of Mrs William Norton Bullard, where windows were broken at her home and also at Ventfort hall, the estate of the late Mrs W. Roscoe Bousal, and at Tanglewood. Traffic was blocked on the Lenox-Stockbridge highway at Brook farm, the summer home of Rev Dr Anson Phelps Stokes.

Charles J. Galvin, Berkshire county state forest fire inspector, and Oscar Hutchinson, Lenox fire chief, inspected the centers of the damage caused by the worst twister that has hit Lenox in many years.

MAY 20 1943

Press Comment of the Hour

Making Music Under a Master.

(Providence Journal.)

Serge Koussevitzky, the famous conductor, conducted a critique before 1200 students the other day. A 100-piece orchestra played. A student conductor conducted. Mr. Koussevitzky sat in the front row with a microphone between his knees. Mr. Petrillo evidently hadn't said no, and everything was dandy.

And what do you think was the first thing Mr. Koussevitzky did? Stopped the orchestra. Stopped cold. Advanced on it gesticulating and said this wouldn't do. It wouldn't do at all. For the musicians hadn't tuned up.

We're delighted at this. For though we are not as naive as the Oriental potentate who insisted on having "that first piece" repeated, we do like the tuning up tremendously. It is different from Shostakovitch, of course. In many ways it differs from most of the moderns. For one thing, its chaotic drift is less ominous. For another, it is always pastoral, like tipsy shepherds at a fair without their wives.

It has a way of gathering volume without gathering headway, voltage without amperage. Just when a program note—one of the good, old-fashioned notes which told all—might get ready to note: "This is a passage of great joy and deep spiritual insight marked by under-currents of sadness and a streak of insanity," it suddenly isn't any such thing, and there's nobody blowing but the oboe, the lovely, plaintive, far-off oboe.

The flutes curl in, the bassoon croaks, the fiddles ripple lightly, a French horn bubbles, the piccolo chirps, and the kettle drums thump while the drummer bends in ecstasy to hear. It is delightful. And by far the most subtle piece on the program, for through the chaos one mighty purpose runs, one dominating and insistent note which holds the very secret of the evening's success.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAY 23 1943

EMINENT Conductor Serge K[illegible] appear here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season in two concerts under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn.

CANTON, N.Y.
ADVERTISER
5/25/43

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the composer.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

MAY 18 1943

Harris to Compose 6th Symphony

Dr. Roy Harris, whose resignation as composer in residence at Cornell University was made public Monday, has been commissioned to compose his sixth symphony by Mark Woods, president of the BLU network.

The announcement followed a conference among Woods, Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present the new work in the spring. Mr. Woods said he was commissioning the new symphony as a result of the splendid response, both here and abroad, to the world premiere of Harris' Fifth Symphony which was played on Feb. 27.

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, yet which would be significant today, in time of war, as it was during the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 19 1943

Roy Harris to Use Lincoln Era Events As Symphony Theme

Roy Harris, American composer, has been commissioned by the Blue network to compose his sixth symphony, the theme of which is to be based on the Lincoln era. Harris announced that he would begin work on the composition shortly in his home near Colorado Springs, Col.

The work is to be given its premiere by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor some time next spring. It will be broadcast. Dr. Koussevitzky has proclaimed Harris' third symphony "the first great American symphony."

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

MAY 23 1943

TECHNICAL EXACTNESS MARKS KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, May 22 (A.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world-famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

TRAINED 50 YEARS

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has molded the Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitols before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

LONG REHEARSALS NEEDED

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs, "fine, fine," and half-sits, half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over 5 foot six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you?" he asks them. "So. If you won't we do it one thousand times."

SINGERS THREATENED

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "if you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Koussevitzky works as hard at themen. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

DISCOVERS' COMPOSER

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. As a 10-year old in the little north Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and calling the music at the top of his lungs.

CHAMBERSBURG, PA.
PUBLIC OPINION

MAY 24 1943

HARRIS TO WRITE SIXTH SYMPHONY

Roy Harris, leading American composer and first to write an accredited U. S. Fifth symphony, has been commissioned to compose his sixth symphony by Mark Woods, president of the Blue Network, it was announced today.

The announcement came following a conference between Woods, Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present the new work next spring.

"As one of the millions of music lovers in this country," said Woods, "I feel that Roy Harris and his works have helped to create the pattern for the American scene. That there is an undeniable need for his music today has been proved by the praise and appreciation received from service men all over the world, our fighting men and those of our Allies, following the first performances of the Fifth Symphony."

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, as significant today in time of war, as were the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

Harris, a composer-in-residence at Cornell University, is singularly equipped to interpret an ephocal American scene, being the son of pioneers who took part in the Cimarron land rush. He was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, on Lincoln's Birthday. At the age of six, he moved with his parents to the San Gabriel Valley in California and was a farmer until 28, when he decided to devote his life to music.

Leaving for his home near Colorado Springs next month, he will then begin work on the new symphony.

[76]

Musician Goes to Army

Monitor, May 26 1943

David Nilsson

Boston Symphony Player Gets Commission

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, bids good-bye to First Lieut. Lawrence White, first Boston Symphony Orchestra member to leave for the Army. Lieutenant White, ordered to report for active service at Washington and Lee University, Virginia, has been a member of one of the busiest groups on the stage at the Pops—the percussion section. His specialties are xylophone, marimba, and vibraphone. He joined the orchestra in 1928 as its youngest member.

Globe May 26

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

MAY 26 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

MAY 27 1943

Vermonter's Tune Big Mystery; Everyone Knows It but Not Name

BOSTON (AP)—Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and nobody recognizes—and radio listeners and muscologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well known theme" and Arthur Fielder conducted it over a nation-wide hook-up.

The Tucson, Ariz., born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

What was its name?

That stumped him. So the announcer asked the radio audience if they could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others thought of the undertaker's song: "The worms crawl in, the worms crawl out."

One musician said it was part of an an old English round, dating back to the time of Three Blind Mice, published about 1608.. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary times.

Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephants Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

A man from Missouri thought it came from an ancient Puerto Rico folk song. This struck a responsive chord in the mind of Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Boston Symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican. He recalled a children's song named Arroz Con Leche, or Rice With Milk, and thought that might be it.

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

MAY 27 1943

Citizens' Group To Complete Drive For Symphony Funds

A special citizens' group of about 50 civic and business leaders, including Mayor Becker, was organized to raise the additional money needed to complete the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's maintenance fund campaign at a luncheon meeting at Hotel DeSoto yesterday.

The drive for $120,000, begun nearly two months ago, has obtained $67,000. Mayor Becker told the special men and women workers if they went out and got in the balance of money needed, he assured them the city would again provide the St. Louis Symphony Society with free rental at Kiel Auditorium in exchange for four free public concerts.

"We have reached the point where it is necessary for us to finish the job in order to engage the orchestra," Mayor Becker said. "I pledge the full support of the city administration. St. Louis must keep its great symphony orchestra."

Isaac Hedges, chairman of the auditorium commission, said it was "inconceivable such a time-honored institution as the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra should not go on. All of us in St. Louis are lovers of good music. The orchestra must be preserved at any cost.

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the orchestra, said the St. Louis orchestra accomplished "a miracle" with 70 men last season when eastern orchestras operated with rosters of more than 100 players. "It is unfortunate we have been unable to engage the orchestra members," he said. "We cannot afford to lose any time in getting the maintenance fund. Every minute is precious and unless something is done quickly, we surely will lose players to other orchestras.

"St. Louis cannot give up the symphony orchestra. It would be years before another orchestra could be organized. It is unbelievable the orchestra might die because of several thousands of dollars."

Charles H. Stix, a vice-president of the symphony society, said, "St. Louis is the only city in the nation which goes through this same humiliation every year. I assure you it isn't poets and dreams in other cities with successful symphony orchestras which support them. All the biggest business men in town are ardent givers, including such cities as Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and Cleveland."

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

MAY 27 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

MAY 26 1943

Everybody Knows Tune But Not Song

Boston—(AP)—Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and no one recognizes—and listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well known theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nationwide hookup.

Knew It as a Boy

The Auscon, Arizona, born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

"What was its name?"

That stumped him. So the public was asked if it could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others thought of the undertakers' songs: "The worms crawl in, the worms crawl out."

One musician said it was part of an an old English round, dating back to the time of Three Blind Mice, published about 1608. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary times.

Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephants Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

A man from Missouri thouhgt it came from an ancient Puerto Rico folk song. This struck a responsive cord in the mind of Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Boston symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican. He recalled a children's song named "Arroz Con Leche," or "Rice with Milk," and thought that might be it.

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

MAY 26 1943

You Know It, Name It

BOSTON—Boston's famous Pop concerts have turned up a tune everyone knows but nobody has been able to name. It began when Robert McBride's "Fugato on a Well Known Theme" was conducted over a nation-wide radio hookup. Some one asked what it was. Not even Leslie J. Rogers, Boston Symphony Orchestra librarian, could tell. An appeal was made to the radio audience and the response was overwhelming, but conflicting. Many said it was "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others traced it to the circus, to an ancient English round and to a Puerto Rican folk song.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

MAY 23 1943

TECHNICAL EXACTNESS MARKS KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, May 22 (A.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world-famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

TRAINED 50 YEARS

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has molded the Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitols before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

LONG REHEARSALS NEEDED

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs, "fine, fine," and half-sits, half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over 5 foot six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers, impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you?" he asks them. "So. If you won't we do it one thousand times."

SINGERS THREATENED

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "if you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Koussevitzky works as hard at themen. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

DISCOVERS' COMPOSER

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. As a 10-year old in the little north Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

CHAMBERSBURG, PA.
PUBLIC OPINION

JUN 24 1943

HARRIS TO WRITE SIXTH SYMPHONY

Roy Harris, leading American composer and first to write an ac credited U. S. Fifth symphony, ha been commissioned to compose h sixth symphony by Mark Wooc president of the Blue Network, was announced today.

The announcement came follo ing a conference between Wo Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevit conductor of the Boston Symph Orchestra, which will present new work next spring.

"As one of the millions of l lovers in this country," said W "I feel that Roy Harris and his have helped to create the pr for the American scene. That is an undeniable need for his today has been proved by the and appreciation received service men all over the wor fighting men and those of ou following the first performances of the Fifth Symphony."

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, as significant today in time of war, as were the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

Harris, a composer-in-residence at Cornell University, is singularly equipped to interpret an ephocal American scene, being the son of pioneers who took part in the Cimarron land rush. He was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, on Lincoln's Birthday. At the age of six, he moved with his parents to the San Gabriel Valley in California and was a farmer until 28, when he decided to devote his life to music.

Leaving for his home near Colorado Springs next month, he will then begin work on the new symphony.

[76]

Musician Goes to Army

Monitor, May 26, 1943

David Nilsson

Boston Symphony Player Gets Commission

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, bids good-bye to First Lieut. Lawrence White, first Boston Symphony Orchestra member to leave for the Army. Lieutenant White, ordered to report for active service at Washington and Lee University, Virginia, has been a member of one of the busiest groups on the stage at the Pops—the percussion section. His specialties are xylophone, marimba, and vibraphone. He joined the orchestra in 1928 as its youngest member.

Utica May 26

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

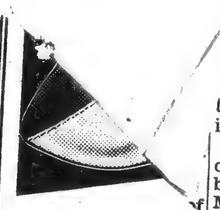
MAY 26 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

MAY 27 1943

Verm... Ever...



BOSTON (... concerts ha... tune that e... body recogi... and muscol... tion are ra... the problen...

It all beg... a member o... ton College, ... "fugato on ... Arthur Fiel... nation-wide...

The Tucs... knew the tu... the work ... tions.

Leslie J. ... Boston Sy... mous for ... "Sure, even...

...went present. Mrs. L. A. Canedy, who had ... en working at the Avery home in Le... en, returned the Saturday be... fo... ompanied by her son, Ralph. Mr... d Mrs. Merrill C. Canedy of Sh... orn, Mass., who were visiting in L... n and Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Barton and children of West Leyden, Mass., joined the party Sunday.

The election of Edward Smith to The Dial Board of Brattleboro high school, at the end of his sophomore year reflects very creditably on talents and efforts.

Some excellent catches of ... been reported this year. S... ermen have caught their ... Ogden caught a 17-inch ... weighing two pounds ... brief trip to Gu... are employed ... Mr. and Mrs. ... Me. They h... in a sum... from P... here ... Nic...

folk song. This struck a responsive chord in the mind of Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Boston Symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican. He recalled a children's song named Arroz Con Leche, or Rice With Milk, and thought that might be it.

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

MAY 27 1943

Citizens' Group To Complete Drive For Symphony Funds

A special citizens' group of about 50 civic and business leaders, including Mayor Becker, was organized to raise the additional money needed to complete the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's maintenance fund campaign at a luncheon meeting at Hotel DeSoto yesterday.

The drive for $120,000, begun nearly two months ago, has obtained $67,000. Mayor Becker told the special men and women workers if they went out and got in the balance of money needed, he assured them the city would again provide the St. Louis Symphony Society with free rental at Kiel Auditorium in exchange for four free public concerts.

"We have reached the point where it is necessary for us to finish the job in order to engage the orchestra," Mayor Becker said. "I pledge the full support of the city administration. St. Louis must keep its great symphony orchestra."

Isaac Hedges, chairman of the auditorium commission, said it was "inconceivable such a time-honored institution as the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra should not go on. All of us in St. Louis are lovers of good music. The orchestra must be preserved at any cost.

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the orchestra, said the St. Louis orchestra accomplished "a miracle" with 70 men last season when eastern orchestras operated with rosters of more than 100 players. "It is unfortunate we have been unable to engage the orchestra members," he said. "We cannot afford to lose any time in getting the maintenance fund. Every minute is precious and unless something is done quickly, we surely will lose players to other orchestras.

"St. Louis cannot give up the symphony orchestra. It would be years before another orchestra could be organized. It is unbelievable the orchestra might die because of several thousands of dollars."

Charles H. Stix, a vice-president of the symphony society, said, "St. Louis is the only city in the nation which goes through this same humiliation every year. I assure you it isn't poets and dreams in other cities with successful symphony orchestras which support them. All the biggest business men in town are ardent givers, including such cities as Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and Cleveland."

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

MAY 27 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

MAY 26 1943

Everybody Knows Tune But Not Song

Boston—(AP)—Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and no one recognizes—and listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well known theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nationwide hookup.

Knew It as a Boy

The Auscon, Arizona, born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

"What was its name?"

That stumped him. So the public was asked if it could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words as the "Elephant's Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

A man from Missouri thought it came from an ancient Puerto Rico folk song.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, a Puerto Rican, recalled a children's song, "Rice With Milk," and thought that might be it.

There the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from.

...they could help solve the dilemma. The response was immediate and ...erwhelming.

Some listeners said the words ...ere: "There she goes, on her toes, ... dressed up in her Sunday ...othes." Others thought of the ...dertakers' songs: "The worms ...awl in, the worms crawl out."

...Tune Nobody ...ps Musicians

..."There she goes, on her toes ...ne of the original tune.

...he response was immediate. ...me said the words were: ...here she goes, on her toes ... ...ressed up in her Sun... y ...othes."

Others suggested the ... ...taker's song: "The worms ... ... in, the worms crawl out."

One musician said it w... ...t of an old English round, dating back to the time of "Three Blind Mice," about 1608.

Circus folks recalled the music ...me from an ancient... song. Jesus Maria Sandroma, Boston symphony pianist, and ...to Rican, recalled such a ... song named "Arroz Con ... "Rice With Milk."

... the matter stands. ...ws the tune, but nc... ...e it came from or ...

folk song. This struck a responsive cord in the mind of Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Boston symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican. He recalled a children's song named "Arroz Con Leche," or "Rice with Milk," and thought that might be it.

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

MAY 26 1943

You Know It, Name It

BOSTON—Boston's famous Pop concerts have turned up a tune everyone knows but nobody has been able to name. It began when Robert McBride's "Fugato on a Well Known Theme" was conducted over a nation-wide radio hookup. Some one asked what it was. Not even Leslie J. Rogers, Boston Symphony Orchestra librarian, could tell. An appeal was made to the radio audience and the response was overwhelming, but conflicting. Many said it was "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others traced it to the circus, to an ancient English round and to a Puerto Rican folk song.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

23 1943

TECHNICAL EXACTNESS MARKS KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, May 22 (A.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world-famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

TRAINED 50 YEARS

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has molded the Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitols before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

LONG REHEARSALS NEEDED

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs, "fine, fine," and half-sits, half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over 5 foot six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you?" he asks them. "So. If you won't we do it one thousand times."

SINGERS THREATENED

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "if you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Koussevitzky works as hard at themen. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsal there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

DISCOVERS' COMPOSER

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about his. As a 10-year old in the little north Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

CHAMBERSBURG, PA.
PUBLIC OPINION

MAY 24 1943

HARRIS TO WRITE SIXTH SYMPHONY

Roy Harris, leading American composer and first to write an ac credited U. S. Fifth symphony, ha been commissioned to compose h sixth symphony by Mark Wooc president of the Blue Network, was announced today.

The announcement came follo ing a conference between Wo Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevit conductor of the Boston Sinyp Orchestra, which will present new work next spring.

"As one of the millions of lovers in this country," said V "I feel that Roy Harris and his have helped to create the p for the American scene. That is an undeniable need for his today has been proved by the and appreciation received service men all over the wor fighting men and those of ou following the first performances of the Fifth Symphony."

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, as significant today in time of war, as were the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

Harris, a composer-in-residence at Cornell University, is singularly equipped to interpret an ephocal American scene, being the son of pioneers who took part in the Cimarron land rush. He was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, on Lincoln's Birthday. At the age of six, he moved with his parents to the San Gabriel Valley in California and was a farmer until 28, when he decided to devote his life to music.

Leaving for his home near Colorado Springs next month, he will then begin work on the new symphony.

[76]

Musician Goes to Army

Monitor, May 26 1943

David Nilsson

Boston Symphony Player Gets Commission

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, bids good-bye to First Lieut. Lawrence White, first Boston Symphony Orchestra member to leave for the Army. Lieutenant White, ordered to report for active service at Washington and Lee University, Virginia, has been a member of one of the busiest groups on the stage at the Pops—the percussion section. His specialties are xylophone, marimba, and vibraphone. He joined the orchestra in 1928 as its youngest member.

Globe May 26

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

MAY 26 1943

Well-Known Tune Nobody Can Name Stumps Musicians

BOSTON, May 26 (AP).—Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and nobody recognizes—and radio listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well-known theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nation-wide hook-up.

The Tucson, Ariz., born composer knew the tune as a boy and composed the work from childhood recollections.

When Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, couldn't identify it, the announcer asked the radio audience to help.

The response was overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others thought of the undertaker's song: "The worm crawl in, the worms crawl out * * * ."

One musician said it was part of an old English round, of the time of "Three Blind Mice," published about 1608. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary times.

Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephants Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

A man from Missouri thought it came from an ancient Puerto Rico folk song. Jesus Maria Sandroma, noted Boston symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican, recalled such a children's song named "Arroz Con Leche," or "Rice With Milk."

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

they could help solve the dilemma. The response was immediate and erwhelming.

Some listeners said the words ere: "There she goes, on her toes, dressed up in her Sunday othes." Others thought of the dertakers' songs: "The worms awl in, the worms crawl out."

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

MAY 27 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

MAY 26 1943

Everybody Knows Tune But Not Song

Boston—(AP)—Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and no one recognizes—and listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well known theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nationwide hookup.

Knew It as a Boy

The Auscon, Arizona, born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

"What was its name?"

That stumped him. So the public was asked if it could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes.' Others thought it was: "The worms crawl in, the worms crawl out . . ."

One musician said it was part of an old English round, dating back to the time of "Three Blind Mice," published about 1608. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary times.

Recalled by Circus Folks

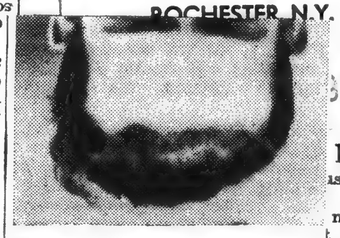
Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephants Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

A man from Missouri thouhgt it came from an ancient Puerto Rico folk song. This struck a responsive cord in the mind of Jesus Maria Sanroma, noted Boston symphony pianist, and a Puerto Rican. He recalled a children's song named "Arroz Con Leche," or "Rice with Milk," and thought that might be it.

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.

43



Prisoners of Japs

It s Pop up a nobody t began

"Fugato
e" was ie radio

hookup. Some one asked what it was. Not even Leslie J. Rogers, Boston Symphony Orchestra librarian, could tell. An appeal was made to the radio audience and the response was overwhelming, but conflicting. Many said it was "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others traced it to the circus, to an ancient English round and to a Puerto Rican folk song.

ASK AID TO AVERT LUMBER SHORTAG

Albany, May 26 (A. P.).—Fo
Federal agencies were asked today to help avert a lumber shortage this year.
Representatives of the Northeastern Lumber Manufacturers school, at the end of his sophomore year reflects very creditably on his talents and efforts.
Some excellent catches of fish have been reported this year. Several fishermen have caught their limit. Leon Ogden caught a 17-inch brown trout weighing two pounds, in Green river.
Mr. and Mrs. Dean West made a brief trip to Guilford, last week. Both are employed as welders in Portland,
Me. They have found living quarters

Graduates from the New York metropolitan area will be:
Fred Anthony Schnurr, 10 Poe
Place, Baldwin.
Sam Aaron Dressin, 1604 St. Johns
Place, Brooklyn. Brooklyn College, 1924.

2-ROOM AP
HOLL
PAUL S. WILEY
Garage Possession floor apartment, 3 r

tained $67,000. Mayor Becker told the special men and women workers if they went out and got in the balance of money needed, he assured them the city would again provide the St. Louis Symphony Society with free rental at Kiel Auditorium in exchange for four free public concerts.

"We have reached the point where it is necessary for us to finish the job in order to engage the orchestra," Mayor Becker said. "I pledge the full support of the city administration. St. Louis must keep its great symphony orchestra."

Isaac Hedges, chairman of the auditorium commission, said it was "inconceivable such a time-honored institution as the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra should not go on. All of us in St. Louis are lovers of good music. The orchestra must ith 70 men last season when eastn orchestras operated with rosters more than 100 players. "It is nfortunate we have been unable engage the orchestra members," e said. "We cannot afford to lose ny time in getting the maintenance fund. Every minute is precious and unless something is done quickly, we surely will lose players to other orchestras.

"St. Louis cannot give up the symphony orchestra. It would be years before another orchestra could be organized. It is unbelievable the orchestra might die because of several thousands of dollars."

Charles H. Stix, a vice-president of the symphony society, said, "St. Louis is the only city in the nation which goes through this same humiliation every year. I assure you it isn't poets and dreams in other cities with successful symphony orchestras which support them. All the biggest business men in town are ardent givers, including such cities as Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and Cleveland."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

MAY 23 1943

TECHNICAL EXACTNESS MARKS KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, May 22 (A.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

The world-famous leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra studied a series of pictures in the backstage Green room at Symphony hall. The gray-haired head was down-bent, and the marvelously expressive hands slowly turned the snapshots.

"See," the soft Russian-accented voice made it sound like zee. "See, here I am in the third movement of the Beethoven Fifth." He looked at other photographs and named the scores.

The test was definitive. For the pictures were made without Koussevitzky's knowledge—by a candid camera expert, wearing a black mask and black gloves to prevent reflections, from a peephole behind the organ pipes at Symphony hall.

A similar thing happened in reverse order after the Berkshire symphonic festival. Weeks after the festival, while watching a silent motion picture of Koussevitzky conducting at Tanglewood, members of the orchestra suddenly began singing, recognizing the music from his gestures.

TRAINED 50 YEARS

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "dictator of the baton" has molded the Boston symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitols before coming to Boston in 1924.

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country. Recently the orchestra signed a contract with the American Federation of Musicians permitting its return to the air after a five-year lapse. Already more than 5000 letters have been received from the vast radio audience which listens in on the Saturday night nation-wide hookup.

LONG REHEARSALS NEEDED

Yet few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs, "fine, fine," and half-sits, half leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over 5 foot six—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers, impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it you?" he asks them. "So. If you won't we do it one thousand times."

SINGERS THREATENED

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "if you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Koussevitzky works as hard as themen. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape (no red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's suburban Brookline, Mass., home—a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

DISCOVERS' COMPOSER

"No matter how many times I have played a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score Koussevitzky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. As a 10-year old in the little north Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

CHAMBERSBURG, PA.
PUBLIC OPINION

MAY 24 1943

HARRIS TO WRITE SIXTH SYMPHONY

Roy Harris, leading American composer and first to write an accredited U. S. Fifth symphony, has been commissioned to compose his sixth symphony by Mark Woodpresident of the Blue Network, was announced today.

The announcement came following a conference between Wo Harris, and Dr. Serge Koussevit conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will present new work next spring.

"As one of the millions of lovers in this country," said V "I feel that Roy Harris and his co have helped to create the p 14 for the American scene. That $5 is an undeniable need for his ye today has been proved by the du and appreciation received not service men all over the wo gro fighting men and those of o following the first performances of the Fifth Symphony."

In accepting the commission, Harris said he would compose a major choral symphony, one which would dwell upon the Lincoln era, as significant today in time of war, as were the trying years of Lincoln's presidency.

Harris, a composer-in-residence at Cornell University, is singularly equipped to interpret an ephocal American scene, being the son of pioneers who took part in the Cimarron land rush. He was born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, on Lincoln's Birthday. At the age of six, he moved with his parents to the San Gabriel Valley in California and was a farmer until 28, when he decided to devote his life to music.

Leaving for his home near Colorado Springs next month, he will then begin work on the new symphony.

[76]

Musician Goes to Army

Monitor May 26 1943

David Nilsson

Boston Symphony Player Gets Commission

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, bids good-bye to First Lieut. Lawrence White, first Boston Symphony Orchestra member to leave for the Army. Lieutenant White, ordered to report for active service at Washington and Lee University, Virginia, has been a member of one of the busiest groups on the stage at the Pops—the percussion section. His specialties are xylophone, marimba, and vibraphone. He joined the orchestra in 1928 as its youngest member.

Globe May 26

Nobody Knows Title of Tune Played at Pop

(AP)—Boston's famous Pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and nobody recognizes—and radio listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "fugato on a well known theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nation-wide hookup.

The Tucson, Ari., born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

"What was its name?"

That stumped him. So the announcer asked the radio audience if they could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There she goes, on her toes, all dressed up in her Sunday clothes." Others thought of the undertakers' songs: "The worms crawl in, the worms crawl out."

One musician said it was part of an old English round, dating back to the time of "Three Blind Mice," published about 1608. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary Times.

Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephant's Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

MAY 27 1943

Musical Mystery Has Nation Guessing But Remains Unsolved

BOSTON (AP) — Boston's famous pops concerts have turned up a musical tune that everybody knows and nobody recognizes and radio listeners and musicologists throughout the nation are racking their brains to solve the problem.

It all began when Robert McBride, a member of the music faculty at Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., wrote a "Fugato on a Well-Known Theme" and Arthur Fiedler conducted it over a nation-wide hookup.

The Tucson, Ariz.-born composer knew the tune as a boy, and composed the work from childhood recollections.

Leslie J. Rogers, librarian for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and famous for his musical memory, said: "Sure, everybody knows it."

"What was its name?"

That stumped him. So the announcer asked the radio audience if they could help solve the dilemma.

The response was immediate and overwhelming.

Some listeners said the words were: "There She Goes, on Her Toes, All Dressed Up in Her Sunday Clothes." Others thought of the undertaker's song: "The Worms Crawl in, the Worms Crawl Out."

One musician said it was part of an old English round, dating back to the time of "Three Blind Mice," published about 1608. Still others stated it came from Ireland or Scotland or derived from American Revolutionary Times.

Circus folks recalled the music as the "Elephant's Walk" or "Jumbo's Tune."

And there the matter stands. Everybody knows the tune, but nobody knows where it came from or what it was called.

ADDING MACHINES and Typewriters Typewriter Co., 1011 Tahnall St.

ALWAYS BUYING ANTIQUES MRS. GEORGE FRANK LORD, HO SHOP, CLAYMONT, H O

KINDL... JEFFICE FURNITUR... Files, Safes, Antiqu... BROS., 105 W 9TH S...

H PRICE PAID for ... hearing stoves. All ... ce fixtures. BERG ... King St. Ph. 3-1913

USED CLOTHING ... ST. PH 4-6969.

...RE TO SELL? ... 4-7627.

...URE OR ... ...es paid ... -2292.

...ld ...

...ate for Sale or Rent 66A

...T SQUARE, PA. ... and apartments. Fur... ...shed. We specialize in ...nnett and Wilming... commuting. ...INGTON, Brokers ...trail, Mgr. ... 409 any ... License.

...OOM, bath and kitchenette, suitable ...an and wife. Phone 3-8361.

...Johns ...

Fred Anthony Schnurr, 10 Poe Place, Baldwin.

Graduates from the New York metropolitan area will be:

The midshipmen, Admiral J. R. Beardall, superintendent, ex-plained, are being graduated a year ahead of schedule under the academy's accelerated program.

Some excellent catches of fish have been reported this year. Several fishermen have caught their limit. Leon Ogden caught a 17-inch brown trout weighing two pounds, in Green river.

Mr. and Mrs. Dean West made a brief trip to Gulliford, last week. R...

...5 miles from Wilmington. A detached ... home in fine setting of trees and shrubs ... bery, 3 bedrooms, 2 baths, powder room ... den on first floor, fireplace in living ... enclosed porch, 2-car garage. Im... mediate possession. Property in excellent condition; ...

306 MARSH ROAD, Hillcrest—8 room ... and bath, powder room on first floor, de... with fireplace, hot water heat, oil unit, 2-car garage. A desirable detached home. Pos... C. ... GRIFFITH CO., 224 W. NINTH ST.

...Albany, May 26 (A. P.).—Fo... Federal agencies were asked to-day to help avert a lumber short-age this year.

Representatives of the North-eastern Lumber Manufacturers school, at the end of his sophomore year reflects very creditably on his talents and efforts.

...been reported this year. Several fish-ermen have caught their limit. Leon Ogden caught a 17-inch brown trout weighing two pounds, in Green river.

...tained $67,000. Mayor Becker told the special men and women workers if they went out and got in the balance of money needed, he assured them the city would again provide the St. Louis Symphony Society with free rental at Kiel Auditorium in exchange for four free public concerts.

"We have reached the point where it is necessary for us to finish the job in order to engage the orchestra," Mayor Becker said. "I pledge the full support of the city administration. St. Louis must keep its great symphony orchestra."

Isaac Hedges, chairman of the auditorium commission, said it was "inconceivable such a time-honored institution as the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra should not go on. All of us in St. Louis are lovers of good music. The orchestra must

...ith 70 men last season when eastern orchestras operated with rosters of more than 100 players. "It is unfortunate we have been unable to engage the orchestra members," he said. "We cannot afford to lose any time in getting the maintenance fund. Every minute is precious and unless something is done quickly, we surely will lose players to other orchestras.

"St. Louis cannot give up the symphony orchestra. It would be years before another orchestra could be organized. It is unbelievable the orchestra might die because of several thousands of dollars."

Charles H. Stix, a vice-president of the symphony society, said, "St. Louis is the only city in the nation which goes through this same humiliation every year. I assure you it isn't poets and dreams in other cities with successful symphony orchestras which support them. All the biggest business men in town are ardent givers, including such cities as Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh and Cleveland."

...decreased production would re-...sult from the order.

..."There is nothing more inflationary," he declared, "than a roll back in prices."

...Honolulu — (AP) — James Sutton (Sunny Jim) McCandless, 87, former imperial potentate of Shriners of North America, died last night. He was a native of Indiana, Pa.

NOTED SHRINER DIES

...ation that Congress may balk ...derwrite a 10 per cent roll back ...e and meat came from Senate ...re) yesterday.

...s RFC Head ...es Doubted

...A

Mr. Arthur Fiedler Again to Direct Spring Musicale

Herald - May 29

Pop Concerts Season Opens At Symphony Hall on May 4

First Program to Be Grenfell Night, With Many Parties Planned Beforehand

By ALISON ARNOLD

As much a part of the springtime in Boston as the swanboats and the tulips in the Public Garden are the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Arthur Fielder, conductor, has arranged a program which will appeal to all music lovers for next Tuesday evening, May 4, the opening night of the 1943 season. This is also Grenfell Night at the Pops, and the many supporters of the Grenfell Mission are assured of a musical treat that evening.

The first half of the program opens with Sousa's "Semper Fidelis," followed by Rossini's overture to "The Barber of Seville," "Hora Burlesca" by Steiner, and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite." The second half is more martial in tone, starting with our national anthem and "God Save the King," in tribute to our British ally, Newfoundland, site of the Grenfell activities. The program continues with the Heroic March of Essa by Gliere, Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture," the "Girls of Baden" waltzes, and concludes with a Salute to our Armed Forces, which includes "The Halls of Montezuma," "Semper Paratus," the Army Air Corps song and the Field Artillery Song.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the Grenfell Pops committee, reports that there has been great demand for tickets, but that a few tables are still available and may be procured from Miss Gertrude Peabody, 760 Brush Hill road, Milton. Patrons for this concert will be Gov. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Bishop and Mrs. Henry Knox Sherrill and H.B.M. Arthur A. George, British consul general in Boston.

In spite of rationing, many dinner parties will precede the concert. Among those entertaining at 270 Dartmouth street will be Mrs. Kennard, whose guests will include Lt. Wellington Wells, Jr., and Mrs. Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin T. Fawcett and Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Hall. Also entertaining there will be Mrs. Charles F. Toppan, whose guests will be Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Allyn Forbes, and Mrs. John W. Stanley, who will be hostess to Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Newbegin, Mrs. Herbert F. West and Mr. Edward P. Goodnow.

Miss Gertrude Peabody will entertain at the Chilton Club for Mr. and Mrs. Max O. Whiting, Mrs. Kenneth D. Blackfan, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P. Mandell, Mr. and Mrs. Walter P. Tobey, Mrs. Henry W. Brewster, Lt. Theodore H. Morris, Mr. Reginald Gray and Dr. Vernon P. Williams. Dining with Mr. and Mrs. John A. Mason will be Mr. and Mrs. Ben Ames Williams, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Thurston Wright, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Quincy Wales will have as their guests Mr. and Mrs. Guilbert Wales, Mr. and Mrs. Sherburn Merrill and Mr. and Mrs. Carrick Kennedy.

The guests of Mr. and Mrs. G. Gilbert Swift, Jr., will be Mr. and Mrs. Henry DeCourcey Ward, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Carlson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Simmers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Bolster, Mrs. Seth B. Robinson and Mr. Henry S. Pinkham. Mrs. William E. Whitelock will entertain Mrs. Henry Thompson and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Long. Mr. and Mrs. Wyman B. Shaw (Rosamond Grenfell) will be the guests of Dr. and Mrs. E. Parker Hayden. Mrs. Theodore L. Badger's guests will include the Rev. and Mrs. Cornelius P. Trowbridge, Dr. and Mrs. Dwight L. Siscoe and the Rev. and Mrs. Allen W. Clark.

Others entertaining that evening will be Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred T. Grenfell, Mr. and Mrs. Eldon Macleod, Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. D. Neuhauser, Miss Greta M. Ferris, Mrs. Arthur C. Badger, Mrs. Vassar Pierce, Dr. Benjamin S. Wood, Mrs. George S. Fuller, Dr. and Mrs. G. Douglas Krumbhaar, Dr. George E Moore, Mrs. Parker Converse, Dr. and Mrs. George W. Van Gorder, Dr. and Mrs. James Means, Mr. and Mrs. Ludlow Griscom and Dr. and Mrs. Robert S. Hurlbut.

The most recent reservations include those of Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Mrs. Horace Binney, Mrs. Arthur Cronin, Mrs. George E. Dean, Mr. Warren W. Dutcher, Mr. Harold C. Faxon, Mrs. Maurice L. Hussey, Mr. H. Wadsworth Hight, Miss Rachel Kilmer, Mr. Stuart F. Kosters, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Lawrence, Mrs. Fred B. Lund, Sr., Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr., Mr. Frederick Plummer, Mrs. Edward S. Rousmaniere, Mr. William Howell Reed, Mrs. John A. Reidy, Mrs. Frederick Stewart, Mrs. Alfred T. Shohl, Mrs. David C. Torrey, Mrs. C. Lloyd Thomas, Mrs. Francis Hastings, Dr. A. C. Woodward and Dr. Paul Gustafson.

(Photo by Bachrach)

TO BE FLOWER VENDOR—Miss Doris Sawyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard M. Sawyer of Andover, will be a flower vendor next Tuesday evening at the opening night of the Pops to benefit the New England Grenfell Association. Miss Sawyer will make her Boston stage debut in "Stage Door," which opens at the Copley Theater May 10.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 30 1943

Hemidemisemiquavers: The Boston "Pops" are sold out much of the time this season, sometimes a week in advance. Now in their forty-eighth season, these Symphony Hall concerts are given by eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony under Arthur Fiedler. . . . Gardner Read's new Symphony No. 2 in E flat minor, winner of this year's first prize in the Paderewski Fund competition, will have its first performance next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. . . . The first performance in England of Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" will be given at the Promenade Concerts in London on July 29, in a special Anglo-American program. John Gielgud will be the speaker.

Good Music Is Popular, Too

Three sailors rushed eagerly up to the ticket counter at a USO club. No tickets? But they had left their names, they protested. Finally two passes were produced, and the third sailor sighed in disappointment. "Don't you think there'd be room for just one more?" he asked plaintively.

These boys were not begging for tickets to a jam session, a musical show, or a movie. What they wanted to hear was a symphony concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, just returned from a concert tour of England for the benefit of war relief, brought back word that there is urgent need to send the highest type of artist to entertain the troops abroad. Authorities are wrong, he asserts, who take it for granted that all the boys want is the lighter type of entertainment.

Mr. Menuhin's statement is corroborated by Miss Winifred Heidt, concert and opera singer, who has just been overseas on a USO camp tour. Miss Heidt reports that at every post she visited groups of young men would gather to talk to her about serious music.

Further testimony—if any is needed—to the hearty appetite of many young Americans for good music may be found in the enthusiasm with which the boys have attended camp concerts by the top-ranking symphony orchestras. In Boston, servicemen are invited to play in special "classical jam sessions" under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. They have responded with alacrity to the invitation.

All this calls for more than just a smile of approval. Public support of organizations supplying this type of entertainment for the boys is needed now, and will be needed increasingly as the men are sent to areas remote from civic centers.

Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

MAY 30 '43

Small Potatoes

Bouncing into Alvin Borges' office to get a minor spectacle repaired before he closed, we were introduced to a young man calling there, which meant we must have something in common. So we inquired bluntly, "And who might you be?" "I am the 12-year-old boy to whom you gave your autograph when "Down to the Sea in Ships" was showing at the Selwyn Theater in Boston," he replied readily.

Now we can't recall that small boy, but we remember the occasion of being sent by the late Z. W. Pease to follow the fate of our local camera excitement and what a mess they made of the score at rehearsal! Toward the end, Clara Bow and Jimmie Turfler were bobbing up and down in a daisy field (where the home of Winston R. Hindle now stands). Composer Gilbert had synchronized the scene with music from "Fra Diavolo." The orchestra had not caught up, by three excerpts in the neatly joined score, hence some dismal music that belonged to an earlier sequence. It was only in this city, under the direction of Al Kartstein, that we had Mr. Gilbert's fine composite in its true integrity.

* * *

Koussevitzky Speaks for Composer

We had not paid much attention to the report of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation on awards until a letter to the music editor of the New York Times signed Serge Koussevitzky, explained the matter. Dr. Koussevitzky points out the fate of the composer of the past and asks what is to be the fate of the composer of today. If he is not dying of heartbreak and hunger, still the creative musician, to whom performing musicians owe their profession, must make a living by teaching and lecturing that crowd his time, kill his energies and his impetus to create.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeals to the whole musical world to support the composer, but calls for first move from musicians "because we owe him most." Dr. Koussevitzky suggests $1 each from the many thousands of performing musicians in this country as establishment of a fund to which the entire musical world will add support, he feels assured.

Olin Downes Answers

Mr. Downes replies in an article of general assent. He reminds also of the unselfish attitude the Russian conductor always has maintained in his foreign publishing house and in his subsequent programs in this country and abroad in giving an opportunity to the composer, even over prejudice.

The report on the awards is appended:

"The Koussevitzky Music Foundation, founded in 1942, in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, approved at its annual meeting awards for symphonic compositions to be written by Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok and William Schuman. The Foundation also authorized grants for chamber music compositions to two young American composers, William Bergsma, now at the Eastman School of Music and Robert M. Palmer, now an instructor at the University of Kansas.

"The directors of the Foundation authorizing these awards are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, Aaron Copland, Dr. Howard Hanson, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Gregor Piatigorsky.

"These are the second series of grants by the Foundation. Last year grants were made to Bohuslav Martinu, whose commissioned symphony was played with great success this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York; to Nicolai Berezowsky, whose new symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Fall and to Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten, both of whom are working on new operas."

* * *

Suggestion from Hans Kindler

The conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, seeking replacements for his men who have entered the Armed Forces, advises that women who plan to play in orchestras should learn a wider range of instruments. Dr. Kindler, after hearing 109 musicians, of whom 78 were women, said that too many of the women played strings. Nearly all were talented, he declared. "They were superb but we need more than strings in an orchestra."

Mr. Arthur Fiedler Again to Direct Spring Musicale

Herald - May 29

Pop Concerts Season Opens At Symphony Hall on May 4

First Program to Be Grenfell Night, With Many Parties Planned Beforehand

By ALISON ARNOLD

As much a part of the springtime in Boston as the swanboats and the tulips in the Public Garden are the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Arthur Fielder, conductor, has arranged a program which will appeal to all music lovers for next Tuesday evening, May 4, the opening night of the 1943 season. This is also Grenfell Night at the Pops, and the many supporters of the Grenfell Mission are assured of a musical treat that evening.

The first half of the program opens with Sousa's "Semper Fidelis," followed by Rossini's overture to "The Barber of Seville," "Hora Burlesca" by Steiner, and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite." The second half is more martial in tone, starting with our national anthem and "God Save the King," in tribute to our British ally, Newfoundland, site of the Grenfell activities. The program continues with the Heroic March of Essa by Gliere, Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture," the "Girls of Baden" waltzes, and concludes with a Salute to our Armed Forces, which includes "The Halls of Montezuma," "Semper Paratus," the Army Air Corps song and the Field Artillery Song.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the Grenfell Pops committee, reports that there has been great demand for tickets, but that a few tables are still available and may be procured from Miss Gertrude Peabody, 760 Brush Hill road, Milton. Patrons for this concert will be Gov. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Bishop and Mrs. Henry Knox Sherrill and H.B.M. Arthur A. George, British consul general in Boston.

In spite of rationing, many dinner parties will precede the concert. Among those entertaining at 270 Dartmouth street will be Mrs. Kennard, whose guests will include Lt. Wellington Wells, Jr., and Mrs. Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin T. Fawcett and Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Hall. Also entertaining there will be Mrs. Charles F. Toppan, whose guests will be Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Allyn Forbes, and Mrs. John W. Stanley, who will be hostess to Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Newbegin, Mrs. Herbert F. West and Mr. Edward P. Goodnow.

Miss Gertrude Peabody will entertain at the Chilton Club for Mr. and Mrs. Max O. Whiting, Mrs. Kenneth D. Blackfan, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas P. Mandell, Mr. and Mrs. Walter P. Tobey, Mrs. Henry W. Brewster, Lt. Theodore H. Morris, Mr. Reginald Gray and Dr. Vernon P. Williams. Dining with Mr. and Mrs. John A. Mason will be Mr. and Mrs. Ben Ames Williams, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Thurston Wright, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Quincy Wales will have as their guests Mr. and Mrs. Guilbert Wales, Mr. and Mrs. Sherburn Merrill and Mr. and Mrs. Carrick Kennedy.

The guests of Mr. and Mrs. G. Gilbert Swift, Jr., will be Mr. and Mrs. Henry DeCourcey Ward, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Carlson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Simmers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Bolster, Mrs. Seth B. Robinson and Mr. Henry S. Pinkham. Mrs. William E. Whitelock will entertain Mrs. Henry Thompson and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Long. Mr. and Mrs. Wyman B. Shaw (Rosamond Grenfell) will be the guests of Dr. and Mrs. E. Parker Hayden. Mrs. Theodore L. Badger's guests will include the Rev. and Mrs. Cornelius P. Trowbridge, Dr. and Mrs. Dwight L. Siscoe and the Rev. and Mrs. Allen W. Clark.

Others entertaining that evening will be Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred T. Grenfell, Mr. and Mrs. Eldon Macleod, Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. D. Neuhauser, Miss Greta M. Ferris, Mrs. Arthur C. Badger, Mrs. Vassar Pierce, Dr. Benjamin S. Wood, Mrs. George S. Fuller, Dr. and Mrs. G. Douglas Krumbhaar, Dr. George E Moore, Mrs. Parker Converse, Dr. and Mrs. George W. Van Gorder, Dr. and Mrs. James Means, Mr. and Mrs. Ludlow Griscom and Dr. and Mrs. Robert S. Hurlbut.

The most recent reservations include those of Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Mrs. Horace Binney, Mrs. Arthur Cronin, Mrs. George E. Dean, Mr. Warren W. Dutcher, Mr. Harold C. Faxon, Mrs. Maurice L. Hussey, Mr. H. Wadsworth Hight, Miss Rachel Kilmer, Mr. Stuart F. Kosters, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Lawrence, Mrs. Fred B. Lund, Sr., Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr., Mr. Frederick Plummer, Mrs. Edward S. Rousmaniere, Mr. William Howell Reed, Mrs. John A. Reidy, Mrs. Frederick Stewart, Mrs. Alfred T. Shohl, Mrs. David C. Torrey, Mrs. C. Lloyd Thomas, Mrs. Francis Hastings, Dr. A. C. Woodward and Dr. Paul Gustafson.

(Photo by Bachrach)

TO BE FLOWER VENDOR—Miss Doris Sawyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard M. Sawyer of Andover, will be a flower vendor next Tuesday evening at the opening night of the Pops to benefit the New England Grenfell Association. Miss Sawyer will make her Boston stage debut in "Stage Door," which opens at the Copley Theater May 10.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

MAY 30 1943

Good Music Is Popular, Too

Three sailors rushed eagerly up to the ticket counter at a USO club. No tickets? But they had left their names, they protested. Finally two passes were produced, and the third sailor sighed in disappointment. "Don't you think there'd be room for just one more?" he asked plaintively.

These boys were not begging for tickets to a jam session, a musical show, or a movie. What they wanted to hear was a symphony concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, just returned from a concert tour of England for the benefit of war relief, brought back word that there is urgent need to send the highest type of artist to entertain the troops abroad. Authorities are wrong, he asserts, who take it for granted that all the boys want is the lighter type of entertainment.

Mr. Menuhin's statement is corroborated by Miss Winifred Heidt, concert and opera singer, who has just been overseas on a USO camp tour. Miss Heidt reports that at every post she visited groups of young men would gather to talk to her about serious music.

Further testimony—if any is needed—to the hearty appetite of many young Americans for good music may be found in the enthusiasm with which the boys have attended camp concerts by the top-ranking symphony orchestras. In Boston, servicemen are invited to play in special "classical jam sessions" under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. They have responded with alacrity to the invitation.

All this calls for more than just a smile of approval. Public support of organizations supplying this type of entertainment for the boys is needed now, and will be needed increasingly as the men are sent to areas remote from civic centers.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 30 1943

Hemidemisemiquavers: The Boston "Pops" are sold out much of the time this season, sometimes a week in advance. Now in their forty-eighth season, these Symphony Hall concerts are given by eighty-five members of the Boston Symphony under Arthur Fiedler. . . . Gardner Read's new Symphony No. 2 in E flat minor, winner of this year's first prize in the Paderewski Fund competition, will have its first performance next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. . . . The first performance in England of Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" will be given at the Promenade Concerts in London on July 29, in a special Anglo-American program. John Gielgud will be the speaker.

Small Potatoes

Bouncing into Alvin Borges' office to get a minor spectacle repair before he closed, we were introduced to a young man calling there, which meant we must have something in common. So we inquired bluntly, "And who might you be?" "I am the 12-year-old boy to whom you gave your autograph when "Down to the Sea in Ships" was showing at the Selwyn Theater in Boston," he replied readily.

Now we can't recall that small boy, but we remember the occasion of being sent by the late Z. W. Pease to follow the fate of our local camera excitement and what a mess they made of the score at rehearsal! Toward the end, Clara Bow and Jimmie Turfler were bobbing up and down in a daisy field (where the home of Winston R. Hindle now stands), Composer Gilbert had synchronized the scene with music from "Fra Diavolo." The orchestra had not caught up, by three excerpts, in the neatly joined score, hence some dismal music that belonged to an earlier sequence. It was only in this city, under the direction of Al Kartstein, that we had Mr. Gilbert's fine composite in its true integrity.

* * *

Koussevitzky Speaks for Composer

We had not paid much attention to the report of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation on awards until a letter to the music editor of the New York Times signed Serge Koussevitzky, explained the matter. Dr. Koussevitzky points out the fate of the composer of the past and asks what is to be the fate of the composer of today. If he is not dying of heartbreak and hunger, still the creative musician, to whom performing musicians owe their profession, must make a living by teaching and lecturing that crowd his time, kill his energies and his impetus to create.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeals to the whole musical world to support the composer, but calls for first move from musicians "beove nit hos

we owe him most." Dr. vitzky suggests $1 each he many thousands of per- musicians in this coun- establishment of a fund to the entire musical world d support, he feels assured.

S

lin Downes Answers

Downes replies in an artic ral assent. He reminds al nselfish attitude the Ru- nductor always has mai in his foreign publishin nd in his subsequent pro n this country and abroad g an opportunity to the r, even over prejudice.

irien man rsea a re er o

Mrs
Fron

report on the awards is d:

know
I bu sen ntin and other ts of s sta

Koussevitzky Music Foun- ounded in 1942, in mem- Natalie Koussevitzky, ap- at its annual meeting for symphonic composi- be written by Igor Stra- Bela Bartok and William The Foundation also d grants for chamber mpositions to two young composers, William now at the Eastman f Music and Robert M. Parri now an instructor at the ver y of Kansas.

ice or r, re-Parri over rectors of the Foundation g these awards are Dr. ussevitzky, Richard Bur- n Copland, Dr. Howard Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell r Piatigorsky.

ofte ent other sixth

n ap- are the second series of Navy the Foundation. Last yea gra nts were made to Bohuslav Martinu, whose commissioned symphony was played with great success this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and New York; to Nicolai Berezowsky, whose new symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Fall and to Samuel Barber and Benjamin Britten, both of whom are working on new operas."

* * *

Suggestion from Hans Kindler

The conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, seeking replacements for his men who have entered the Armed Forces, advises that women who plan to play in orchestras should learn a wider range of instruments. Dr. Kindler, after hearing 109 musicians, of whom 78 were women, said that too many of the women played strings. Nearly all were talented he declared. "They were superb but we need more than strings in an orchestra."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 30 1943

RECORDS: NEW CONTRACT

Philadelphia Orchestra Leaves Victor for Columbia—Recent Releases

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

THE Philadelphia Orchestra, which has probably made more recordings than any other symphonic ensemble in the country and perhaps in the world, has shifted its allegiance from Victor to Columbia. It has signed a long-term contract with the latter company and will make recordings, under its conductor, Eugene Ormandy, for Columbia as soon as the ban on new records is lifted by the Musicians Union.

If and when the ban is lifted—there seems to be no immediate prospect that it will be, though it has been in effect for ten months—the Philadelphia Orchestra will undoubtedly make a host of important works under its new label. Columbia will probably be eager to make the most out of the latest acquisition, and it is safe to predict that the Philadelphia Orchestra will continue to be the American leader as far as quantity of recordings is concerned.

Good Sellers

The disks by the Philadelphia Orchestra have been among the most valuable items in the Victor catalogue, and they have sold, particularly many conducted by Leopold Stokowski, in enormous numbers over the years. Victor retains in its list this immense backlog of works, ranging over many schools and epochs. Columbia will hasten to build its Philadelphia Orchestra catalogue as soon as it is able.

The two major companies thus continue their lively competition for established talent. It is to be hoped that when the ban is lifted they will vie with each other to give a hearing to new artists and ensembles. Competition in the recording of contemporary music would also be welcome.

REVIEWS

Fauré: Incidental Music to Pelléas et Mélisande. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. (Victor DM-941, two twelve-inch records.) Fauré wrote his incidental music to Maeterlinck's play before Debussy, and the three movements of this suite have Fauré's characteristic restrained and lyrical eloquence. But when one recalls the matchless subtlety and psychological penetration of Debussy's score, Fauré's music seems obvious. Other composers have tackled "Pelléas"; Sibelius wrote some incidental music, and, like Fauré, was nowhere within reach of the insight of Debussy's music. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians play Fauré's suite with fullness of tone and elegance of line. On the fourth side is a lively version of Rimsky-Korsakoff's setting of the Russian folk-song, Dubinushka.

Borodin: Symphony No. 2, in B minor. Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. (Columbia M-528, four twelve-inch records.) The Borodin symphony is a fairly recurrent item on orchestral programs, and Mr. Mitropoulos and his ensemble have given it a taut, vibrant performance. The album sent to us varies in quality, with some disks better than others. This new recording would seem to be the best available of the symphony, provided the disks you get are without imperfections. On the eighth side is the popular Sailor's Dance from Glière's Soviet ballet, "Red Poppy."

Ravel: Rapsodie Espagnole. Cleveland Orchestra conducted by Artur Rodzinski. (Columbia, X-234, two twelve-inch records.) Count that month incomplete that does not bring a new recording by the Clevelanders and Rodzinski, though the series under the leadership of Mr. Rodzinski is likely to come to an end now that the conductor belongs to New York. Under the new conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, however, there will probably be new recordings later on. The Ravel music is played with precision, rhythmic vitality and rich orchestral color. The recording compares favorably with the best of this work.

In the Popular Field

An album of Film Favorites (Victor P-136, four ten-inch records) has been made by David Rose and his orchestra. It includes eight tunes, some of which have retained their vogue for quite a while. Contents: The Continental, Thanks for the Memory, Lullaby of Broadway, Over the Rainbow, The Way You Look Tonight, When You Wish Upon a Star, Sweet Leilani and The Last Time I Saw Paris.

Jimmy Dorsey and orchestra offer In the Middle of a Dream and All or Nothing at All, which are just fair for this outfit (Decca).

Billie Hayes, a capable blues singer, sings of the woes of a want of money in I Can't Get Enough and a want of men in Man Shortage Blues (Beacon).

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

Mark Woods, president of the Blue network, commissions Roy Harris, leading American composer, to write his sixth symphony, dedicated to the nation's fighting forces and based upon a momentous event in the life of Abraham Lincoln. Left to right, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will present the world premiere performance over the Blue network in the spring, Mark Woods, and at the piano, Roy Harris.

Composers' Social Security; More About Koussevitzky Plan

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The response to Serge Koussevitzky's call to battle, printed last Sunday in this corner, was something of a surprise. Evidently, the sorry situation of the composer is a matter a good many people besides Dr. Koussevitzky have given considerable reflection, but it is equally evident that not a few disagree with him as to the means of making it possible for a composer to earn a dignified living. The consensus of the opinions received here during the week is "it's a good idea, but hardly practical."

Well, as I said at the time, it is decidedly open to question if Dr. Koussevitzky's scheme, as he stated it (that is, to tax performing musicians $1 a year to sustain a general fund to be disbursed to the composers), is practical. I still feel, however, that such a crusade, impractical although it may be at this stage of the game, is both necessary and desirable and that further, Dr. Koussevitzky is just the man to lend his name and his energy to the foundation of such an enterprise. How it is worked out in the future is not, at the moment, important. The essential thing is, somebody has started something that should have been started decades ago.

It is fitting, however, to listen to the points brought up by our correspondents. The first, a professional musican, says, in part:

A TENTATIVE PLAN

"While I am as eager to help the composer as anyone else, I fail to see why the musician should be expected to carry the burden single-handed. It is true, as you say, we are 'parasite' on but creative musician, and we are naturally respectful of that fact. But does that obligate us to subsidize the incompetent contemporary composer, whose musical inspiration is frequently wholly wanting, whose technical demands are ferocious for no reason whatever than to prove he is capable of demanding them, and whose music is arid, stupid and about as interesting as a slide rule? Let the composer learn, as we all have to, that he must prove himself worthy of his hire, and he'll get along. Better than the rest of us, for that matter."

Several other correspondents reflect a similar point of view. They ask, rather justly, who is to determine if a composer is worth subsidizing assuming a practical aid can be worked out? Some fear subsidy might stifle creative impulse; others feel wholesale subsidy would soon degenerate into a closed corporation favoring one personality or school of composition over another; others say that the really great music of the world is the result of personality or economic conflicts and to tamper with such natural or accidental phenomena would be tantamount to sacrilege. In short, a surprising number of people seem to feel that the composer is a sort of natural phenomenon, and that to keep him hungry, solitary and desolate is all a part of the natural law of things.

Personally, I have to agree with many of the points made, but I think their makers should be straightened out on one thing: Koussevitzky's projected foundation is not designed to help the composer who has not already helped himself by proving the quality of his work, but to help the composer whose works are constantly, or at least occasionally, performed by the orchestras of the nation. One thing at least is certain: 99 per cent. of them cannot support themselves with the products of their creative genius, if any, even though their works are performed with regularity.

While none of my correspondents have asked me for any practical suggestions—and none of them actually offered any—I feel a solution might be arrived at along the following lines:

A MUSICIAN DEMURRS

The basic assumption is that the public always pays in the long run. Therefore, every concert of serious music should be assessed by the foundation according to its total gross receipts and according to its program, provided the concert is a commercial venture charging admission and/or provided the musicians performing are not donating their services, and regardless of the presence of individual performance fees, publisher's fees, score rentals or other encumbrances. In short, the music to be performed, whether it be by Bach (and in the public domain) or Bartok (and subject to performance royalty), must be considered an expense as tangible as the musician, the electric lights or the rental of the hall. There should be no exceptions whatever, whether the music is ancient or modern.

The assessments should be pro rated 1, according to the total gross receipts of the concert and 2, according to the length of the compositions on the program, regardless of character. Thus musical events would be divided into ten classes ranging from those grossing $5000 or over to those grossing $50 or over, and musical compositions would be divided into six time classes from up to five minutes to one hour or over.

Say a fee of $25 is arbitrarily set as an assessment on a composition exceeding 60 minutes in playing time for a concert grossing more than $5000. A sliding scale could then be mathematically constructed to insure complete fairness of assessment. For instance, a Pops concert consisting of ten compositions ranging in time duration from 5 to 15 minutes and grossing $1800 at the box office would cost the management, according to our scale, $15.50. On the other hand, an average piano recital would cost the artist or management $2.75 if the gross were $400. Certainly that is a just fee for both, isn't it? And the public, as usual, would absorb the blow painlessly.

This money, which would amount in the course of a year to a pretty impressive sum considering the fabulous number of concerts, recitals and musical events in this country each season, would be forwarded to a duly authorized foundation which, at the end of the fiscal year, would disburse the money on a pro rata basis to the living composers whose works had appeared, during that year, on concert programs. The payments would also be figured mathematically according to the character of the work (not its time length), and the frequency of its performance. Thus a symphony would draw a higher percentage than a song, etc. And all this would still leave the composer free to drive as hard a bargain with his publisher as he could, for the assessment is over and above any performance fee. Moreover, the system, working automatically, leaves the public as the final arbiter, for the composer is remunerated according to his ability to write music the public wants to hear, yet insures him a certain income if his music, as often proves to be the case, withholds its secrets for later days. Any questions or omissions?

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JUN 12 1943

Words About Music

American Vs. ·gn Conductors

By John Selby
(Associated Press Arts Editor)

NEW YORK.—When does the American conductor get a break?

The question is not new, but it has boiled up afresh now that the Chicago Symphony has gone to Desire Lefauw, and the Cleveland Orchestra to Erich Leinsdorf. Mr. Defauw is a belgian; Mr. Leinsdorf a Viennese.

The answer, as Arthur Judson gives it is double-barrelled. American conductors will get a break when an effective means of training them can be developed, and when they learn to keep their eyes off the Hollywood-radio fleshpots.

Mr. Judson manages more conductors than everybody else in America put together. He knows the few remaining. But he was able to think up only 14 who might remotely have qualified for either job, and none who was a "must." He was not pleased to have it so; he seemed a little exasperated, in fact. But he could not deny it.

European System

"In Europe, at least until the present war, they had a system of conductor-training that was foolproof," he explained. Mr. Judson is a big man florid direct of speech and precise as well.

"A boy used to graduate from his conservatory with all the tools of his trade at hand" he continued. "He got himself a job as third assistant at Erfurt, perhaps. That meant he ran errands, pounded out roles for singers, played for chorus rehearsals.

"Then he picked up a second assistantship somewhere, and did much the same thing only perhaps he was granted sectional rehearsals, and perhaps someday the director would say 'Take the stick a minute; I want to hear this from the back of the house.'

"Then a first assistanship at Berlin, perhaps, with conducting to do, a chorus on the outside, perhaps a chamber orchestra of his own or a chance at symphony work. And so on—when at last he became first conductor somewhere he knew absolutely everything there was to know, and he had tried everything, which is more important."

Succomb To Cold

We don't do things that way here, Mr. Judson adds, regretfully. A clever boy discovers he can make huge sums on the radio and he makes it. Sometimes like Howard Barlow, he is a serious and capable musician—but how can Mr. Barlow used to $50,000 or $60,000 a year, come down to the scale paid by most symhony orchestras?

A young conductor can take a young orchestra and learn from it, but he must be content to work his heart out for $5,000 a year. After a while he will be ready for a big job if he hasn't gone radio or Hollywood. Izler Solomon in Columbus, O., is an example of the serious young man getting training the right way, Mr. Judson thinks.

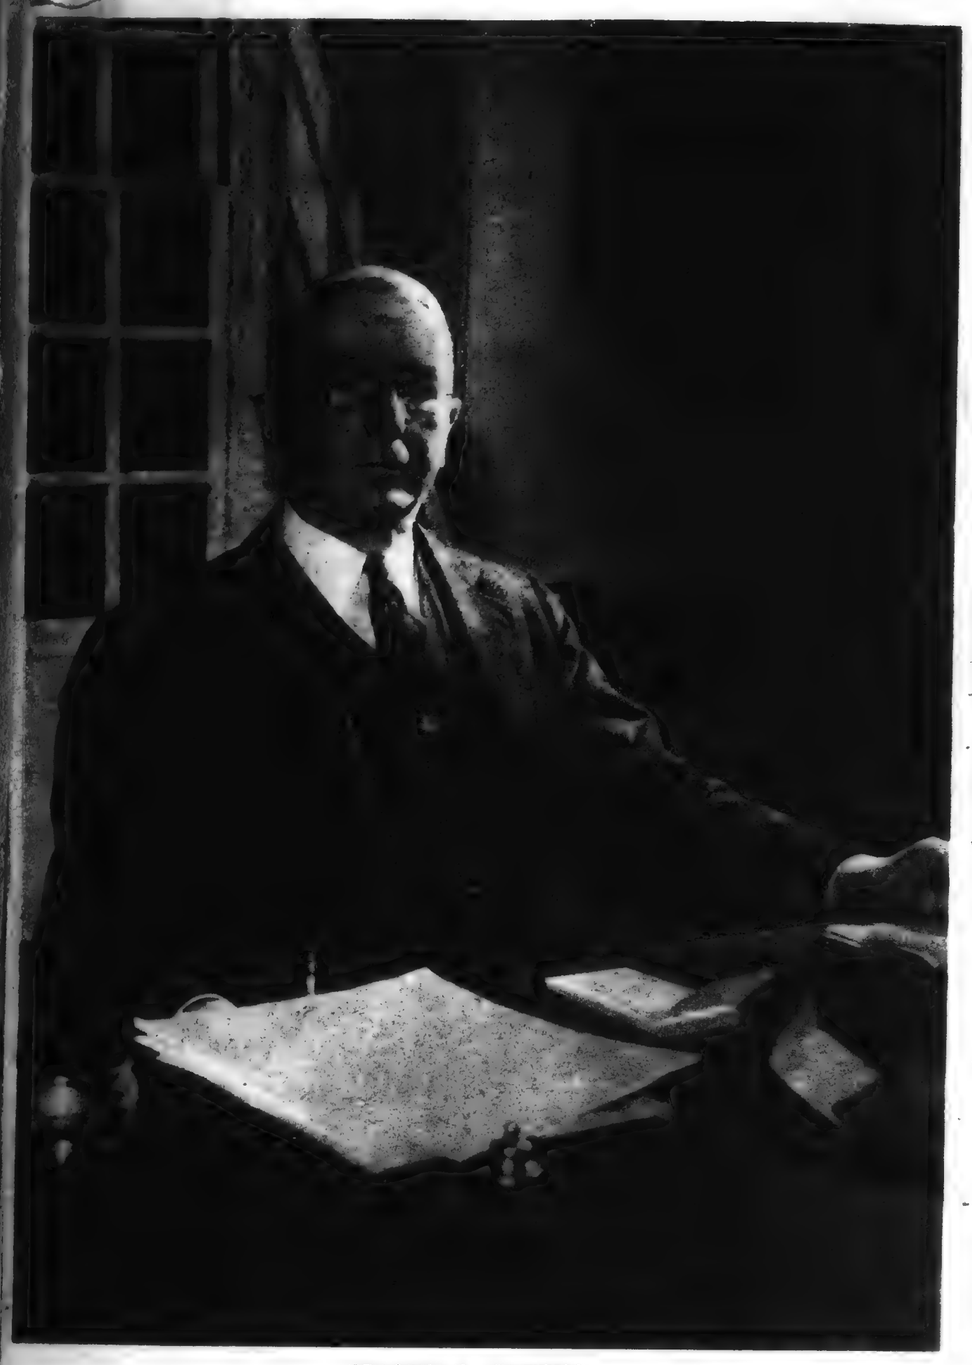
"Otherwise, the answer is for conductors to do what Serge Koussevitzky is doing" he says. "That's to personally train young men as Koussevitzky has done at Tanglewood."

There is a rumor that another eastern orchestra may try a similar plan, but in the regular season.

[78]

His Career Measures Harvard

By Robert K. Shellaby



JEROME D. GREENE
Retiring Secretary of the Board of Overseers of Harvard University

INSTITUTIONS have been called the lengthening shadows of individuals, so it may be fitting to adapt the metaphor to say that Harvard University can be measured by the career of an individual such as Jerome D. Greene.

Long-time Secretary to the Harvard Corporation, organizer of a forerunner of the Brookings Institution, molder of the Rockefeller Foundation, one-time international banker, current president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, patron of many another cultural and civic enterprise, Mr. Greene would nevertheless be the first to disclaim any aptness in the metaphor. Yet his modesty and reticence are characteristic of builders and shapers of institutions, and any disclaimer would add to the aptness in a great tradition.

Mr. Greene's retirement from his Harvard secretaryship on July 1 offers a vantage point from which to review his career—and measure Harvard. Like any educational institution, Harvard cannot be measured in a vacuum. Its product is a good basis of measurement, and Jerome Greene is a good product.

* * *

Any review of his career at this time, however, must be incomplete, for his career is unfinished: he's remaining active as head of the Boston Symphony, trustee and treasurer of the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston, trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, Secretary of Harvard's Board of Overseers, and Honorary Keeper of the Corporation Records, the latter a post set up to do him honor.

When interviewed in his office in Massachusetts Hall shortly after Harvard announced his retirement, Mr. Greene said he welcomed the release from routine, because it would leave him free to plunge in full taste into personal interests. Those interests are as wide as Harvard itself, any one of which could be a career in itself.

Jerome Greene was born in Yokohama, the son of Daniel Crosby and Mary Jane Forbes Greene. His father was the first missionary sent to Japan by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Young Greene received his Bachelor's degree from Harvard in 1896 and was a student in the Law School from 1897 to 1899. He received an honorary A. M. degree from Harvard in 1914 and another, LL.D., in 1937, the year after directing Harvard's Tercentenary Celebration.

Besides founding the Alumni Bulletin 45 years ago, he started the University Gazette and the Harvard Alumni Directory.

Secretary of three presidents of Harvard, Mr. Greene in July of 1901 became Secretary to President Eliot. With the name of the post changed in 1905 to that of Secretary to the Corporation, he continued in office until 1910, serving the final year under President Lowell. He again became Secretary in 1934, under President Conant.

He has served twice as an elected member of the Board of Overseers, 1911-13 and 1917-23. In 1924 he staged the celebration of the ninetieth anniversary of Dr. Eliot.

In 1910, Mr. Greene became general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, serving two years. He also became trustee of that institute and of the General Education Board, and trustee and secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation.

During the first war, his relief work included chartering and loading the first Belgian relief ships from the United States consigned by the Rockefeller Foundation to Herbert Hoover's organization.

Later, he was executive secretary of the American Shipping Mission in London, which represented the United States on the Allied Maritime Transport Council. In 1919, he served as Joint Secretary of the Reparations Commission at the Peace Conference in Paris.

Two of the more important rôles Mr. Greene says he is "proud" to have played were as an organizer of a research institute which in an amalgamation became the Brookings Institution, and as an active member of the Institute of Pacific Relations, whose international chairman he was from 1929 to 1933.

* * *

From 1932 to 1934, he served as Wilson Professor of International Politics at the University of Wales, occupying the chair set up in honor of America's World War President.

From 1918 to 1932, Mr. Greene was a member of the banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co., specializing in foreign finance and national credits. His business interests took him on three extensive trips through Latin America, four times to Japan, twice to China, and a great many times to Europe.

A keen observer of world affairs today, he says he retains a close interest in Japan, due to circumstances of his birth, business interests, and travels, during which he has met many Japanese prime ministers, ambassadors, and other officials.

"Japan, of course, must be disarmed and the fruitage of her aggressions since 1931 must be taken away," he said when interviewed recently. "Japan lost her best chance for primacy in the Far East when she chose the path of war. Had Japan used for peace the vast amounts of money lost in the China venture and in preparing for her present war with the Allies, Japan would have had a high standard of living today which would have been the source of admiration on every side and would have won her good-will for the very primacy which she thought she could gain by aggression."

A "concrete proposal" for the remaking of Japan he supports is a constitutional change making the military subordinate to the civil administration.

"Tojo, not Hirohito, is the symbolic enemy; the Emperor is practically a puppet. It would be well if the Imperial Household could follow the pattern of Britain's Royal Family and become the symbol for all that's good in Japanese life," he said.

Mr. Greene is being succeeded in the Corporation post by A. Calvert Smith '14, now Assistant to President Conant. Paying "my respects" to journalism for giving him invaluable experience in his later career, Mr. Greene pointed out in good humor that he had been an undergraduate president of the Harvard Crimson, whose other presidents, he said, included his successor "and Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Of all the expressions of gratitude which Mr. Greene is receiving these days from admiring Harvardians, none is perhaps more pleasing than that of the Alumni Bulletin, saying: "With Charles William Eliot, James Bryce, and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, he is one of the few men who have ever received two Harvard honorary degrees. If any man deserves a third one, it is he."

Photos by Staff Photograph

HARVARD UNIVERSITY'S MEMORIAL GATE
One of the ... rances to America's Most Renowned College

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN 1 - 1943

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JUN 13 1943

Such Is Fame

Harry Rauch, one of the publicity department greats of the Blue Network, recently authored the feature article, "The Story of Koussevitzky," which was printed in the Bridgeport, "Post." Now it has been included in "This Is Your America," an anthology of "Inspired Newspaper Feature Articles." BUT.... the proud author is listed in the venerable tome as Harry RANCH.

[79]

A chip off the maternal block is Marina, daughter of Nina Koshetz. The mother was heard here with the famed Ukrainian Chorus, of which her uncle, Alexander Koshetz, was the conductor, and as soloist with the Boston Symphony under both Monteux and Koussevitzky. Her singing, most pleasurably recalled, was notable for its rare tonal charm and sensibility. The daughter, who has already made her operatic beginings, both on the West Coast and in New York with the New Opera Company has just completed an engagement at the Copley-Plaza whither she will return next September.

In the meantime, Serge Koussevitzky, an old family friend, is to hear her at his estate in the Berkshires. What will come of that encounter remains to be seen. An appearance with the Symphony is at least a possibility. The natural brilliance of her widely ranging and expressive voice was stepped up by the amplification apparently inseparable from "night club" performances. Her Slavic beauty and vivid temperament got across quite unaided.

His Career Measures Harvard

By Robert K. Shellaby

JEROME D. GREENE
Retiring Secretary of the Board of Overseers of Harvard University

INSTITUTIONS have been called the lengthening shadows of individuals, so it may be fitting to adapt the metaphor to say that Harvard University can be measured by the career of an individual such as Jerome D. Greene.

Long-time Secretary to the Harvard Corporation, organizer of a forerunner of the Brookings Institution, molder of the Rockefeller Foundation, one-time international banker, current president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, patron of many another cultural and civic enterprise, Mr. Greene would nevertheless be the first to disclaim any aptness in the metaphor. Yet his modesty and reticence are characteristic of builders and shapers of institutions, and any disclaimer would add to the aptness in a great tradition.

Mr. Greene's retirement from his Harvard secretaryship on July 1 offers a vantage point from which to review his career—and measure Harvard. Like any educational institution, Harvard cannot be measured in a vacuum. Its product is a good basis of measurement, and Jerome Greene is a good product.

* * *

Any review of his career at this time, however, must be incomplete, for his career is unfinished: he's remaining active as head of the Boston Symphony, trustee and treasurer of the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston, trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, Secretary of Harvard's Board of Overseers, and Honorary Keeper of the Corporation Records, the latter a post set up to do him honor.

When interviewed in his office in Massachusetts Hall shortly after Harvard announced his retirement, Mr. Greene said he welcomed the release from routine, because it would leave him free to plunge in full taste into personal interests. Those interests are as wide as Harvard itself, any one of which could be a career in itself.

Jerome Greene was born in Yokohama, the son of Daniel Crosby and Mary Jane Forbes Greene. His father was the first missionary sent to Japan by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Young Greene received his Bachelor's degree from Harvard in 1896 and was a student in the Law School from 1897 to 1899. He received an honorary A. M. degree from Harvard in 1914 and another, LL.D., in 1937, the year after directing Harvard's Tercentenary Celebration.

Besides founding the Alumni Bulletin 45 years ago, he started the University Gazette and the Harvard Alumni Directory.

Secretary of three presidents of Harvard, Mr. Greene in July of 1901 became Secretary to President Eliot. With the name of the post changed in 1905 to that of Secretary to the Corporation, he continued in office until 1910, serving the final year under President Lowell. He again became Secretary in 1934, under President Conant.

He has served twice as an elected member of the Board of Overseers, 1911-13 and 1917-23. In 1924 he staged the celebration of the ninetieth anniversary of Dr. Eliot.

In 1910, Mr. Greene became general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, serving two years. He also became trustee of that institute and of the General Education Board, and trustee and secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation.

During the first war, his relief work included chartering and loading the first Belgian relief ships from the United States consigned by the Rockefeller Foundation to Herbert Hoover's organization.

Later, he was executive secretary of the American Shipping Mission in London, which represented the United States on the Allied Maritime Transport Council. In 1919, he served as Joint Secretary of the Reparations Commission at the Peace Conference in Paris.

Two of the more important rôles Mr. Greene says he is "proud" to have played were as an organizer of a research institute which in an amalgamation became the Brookings Institution, and as an active member of the Institute of Pacific Relations, whose international chairman he was from 1929 to 1933.

* * *

From 1932 to 1934, he served as Wilson Professor of International Politics at the University of Wales, occupying the chair set up in honor of America's World War President.

From 1918 to 1932, Mr. Greene was a member of the banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co., specializing in foreign finance and national credits. His business interests took him on three extensive trips through Latin America, four times to Japan, twice to China, and a great many times to Europe.

A keen observer of world affairs today, he says he retains a close interest in Japan, due to circumstances of his birth, business interests, and travels, during which he has met many Japanese prime ministers, ambassadors, and other officials.

"Japan, of course, must be disarmed and the fruitage of her aggressions since 1931 must be taken away," he said when interviewed recently. "Japan lost her best chance for primacy in the Far East when she chose the path of war. Had Japan used for peace the vast amounts of money lost in the China venture and in preparing for her present war with the Allies, Japan would have had a high standard of living today which would have been the source of admiration on every side and would have won her good-will for the very primacy which she thought she could gain by aggression."

A "concrete proposal" for the remaking of Japan he supports is a constitutional change making the military subordinate to the civil administration.

"Tojo, not Hirohito, is the symbolic enemy; the Emperor is practically a puppet. It would be well if the Imperial Household could follow the pattern of Britain's Royal Family and become the symbol for all that's good in Japanese life," he said.

Mr. Greene is being succeeded in the Corporation post by A. Calvert Smith '14, now Assistant to President Conant. Paying "my respects" to journalism for giving him invaluable experience in his later career, Mr. Greene pointed out in good humor that he had been an undergraduate president of the Harvard Crimson, whose other presidents, he said, included his successor "and Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Of all the expressions of gratitude which Mr. Greene is receiving these days from admiring Harvardians, none is perhaps more pleasing than that of the Alumni Bulletin, saying: "With Charles William Eliot, James Bryce, and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, he is one of the few men who have ever received two Harvard honorary degrees. If any man deserves a third one, it is he."

Photos by Staff Photograph

HARVARD UNIVERSITY'S MEMORIAL GATE
One of the Many Entrances to America's Most Renowned College

BOSTON, MASS. DAILY
ADVERTISER, N. Y.
JUN 1 - 1943

Such Is Fame

Harry Rauch, one of the publicity department greats of the Blue Network, recently authored the feature article, "The Story of Koussevitzky," which was printed in the Bridgeport, "Post." Now it has been included in "This Is Your America," an anthology of "Inspired Newspaper Feature Articles." BUT.... the proud author is listed in the venerable tome as Harry RANCH.

[79]

A chip off the maternal [illegible] is Marina, daughter of Nina Koshetz. The mother was heard here with the famed Ukrainian Chorus, of which her uncle, Alexander Koshetz, was the conductor, and as soloist with the Boston Symphony under both Monteux and Koussevitzky. Her singing, most pleasurably recalled, was notable for its rare tonal charm and sensibility. The daughter, who has already made her operatic beginnings, both on the West Coast and in New York with the New Opera Company has just completed an engagement at the Copley-Plaza whither she will return next September.

In the meantime, Serge Koussevitzky, an old family friend, is to hear her at his estate in the Berkshires. What will come of that encounter remains to be seen. An appearance with the Symphony is at least a possibility. The natural brilliance of her widely ranging and expressive voice was stepped up by the amplification apparently inseparable from "night club" performances. Her Slavic beauty and vivid temperament got across quite unaided.

POP CONCERT

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conductor, gave the 37th program of its 5th season in Symphony Hall last night. The soloists were Walter Trampler, violinist, and Emil Kornsand, violist, and the program was as follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Largo from "Xerxes" ..... Handel
Waltz Scene from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Symphony Concertant for Violin and Viola (K. 364) ..... Mozart
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
Wine, Woman and Song, waltzes ..... Strauss
Jealousy, Gypsy Tango ..... Gade
Strike up the Band ..... Gershwin

With the season rapidly turning into the last weeks, the Pops sort of forgot themselves last night and played something different. Oh, there was the usual assortment of tuneful Popsiana such as the ubiquitous Largo, the omnipresent "Wine, Woman and Song," the inevitable "Jealousy" and the residential Gershwin medley, but there was also Mozart's exceedingly grateful Symphony Concertante for violin and viola.

This unique composition, a gem of purest Mozart, is a double concerto in the true gallant style, filled, in its outer movements with the serenely happy, cloudless sort of melody found almost nowhere else but in Mozart. They rise occasionally to a degree of excitement, but the climaxes are seldom crammed with drama and never with sound and fury. The Andante, however, is cast in a different mould, for in it the young composer (he was then 23 and fate was beginning to overtake him), reveals virtually for the first time a trace of melancholy introspection. It's one of the most enjoyable works of its kind I know, and judging both by the quiet attention and the very cordial reception it got, the audience loved it, too.

In the solo roles, Walter Trampler and Emil Kornsand, both members of the orchestra, performed with admirable style and precision. Neither achieved big tones, but they played with balance and unity, doing the cadenzas with especial unanimity. There were fleeting moments when the tuttis were slightly off the beat, but generally speaking, it was a most creditable duet performance. As in the other pieces on the program, Mr. Fiedler conducted the accompanying orchestra firmly and straightforwardly, the orchestra obviously remaining in high spirits despite its chore of playing the same old stuff night after night. Its ability to do just that, come to think of it, is just why it's all your life is worth to get a ticket—and just why the Pops are the Pops.

MUSIC

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops Orchestra, Quincy Porter and Francis Findlay guest conductors, gave the 44th program of its 58th season at Symphony Hall last night; the soloist was Beveridge Webster, pianist, in addition to the New England Conservatory Chorus, and the program was as follows:

Triumphal March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" ..... Smetana
Berceuse from "The Fire-Bird" ..... Stravinsky
"The Incredible Flutist" Ballet ..... Piston
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23 ..... Tchaikovsky
Soloist: Beveridge Webster
Conducted by Francis Findlay, Supervisor of Division of School Music
The New England Conservatory Chorus—
Chorus of the Cigarette Girls, from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Spring Chorus from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Spinning Chorus from "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes. ..... Strauss
Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik

New England Conservatory evening at Symphony Hall last evening turned out to be an unusually rewarding affair, with Beveridge Webster's performance of Tchaikovsky's Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1 providing the major portion of the excitement. This is said advisedly, for surely if any 19th century piano concerto has been done to death both by the swing bands, in their own peculiar arrangements, and by the classical musicians with an eye for popular approval, it is assuredly this work. All the more credit, then to Mr. Webster for a fine, vigorous interpretation, not over-romanticized—which is a hard pitfall to avoid—nor rushed, but played for its inherent beauty and rich melodious invention. The orchestra, conducted by Quincy Porter, dean of the faculty at the Conservatory, offered excellent support, and there was a solid ovation at the end, with nearly half the audience standing to applaud the soloist.

Mr. Porter led the musicians in such familiar numbers as the march from "Aida," "The Bartered Bride" overture, the Berceuse from "Fire-bird," and Walter Piston's "The Incredible Flutist." This latter work, which gains somewhat from ballet interpretation, is brisk, sophisticated and mildly satiric, a little on the dry side but geared to popular taste and generally well received as it was last night. Mr. Piston was in the audience to acknowledge the applause. The final novelty of the evening was the appearance of the Conservatory Chorus in three selections, led by Francis Findley. Their singing was fresh and pleasing, though their collective diction was not any too good, and the audience demanded and received an encore. The concert ended with Mr. Findley's admirable conducting of "Tales From the Vienna Woods" and "Entrance of the Gladiators."

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops orchestra, Paul Cherkassky, conducting, gave the 57th program of its 58th season in Symphony Hall last night, performing the following program:

"Semper Paratus," U. S. Coast Guard Song ..... Van Boskerck
Overture to "Ruy Blas" ..... Mendelssohn
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Ballet music from "The Demon" ..... Rubenstein
Nocturne: "Festivals" ..... Debussy
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" ..... Moussorgsky
Finale, Fifth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
"Vienna Blood," waltzes ..... Strauss
Intermezzo, "Souvenir of Vienna" ..... Provost
Dance of the Buffons from "Snow Maiden" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

Something always happens at the Pops.

Last night it was the incident of the SPARS and the admiral (besides, of course, the music), but there's always something.

It seems about a hundred SPARS were guests of the management of the Pops. They all sat down front in their spectacularly white uniforms, drinking punch or whatever it is SPARS may safely drink, and offering a good deal of competition both to the music and to the civilian girls in flowered dresses, one or both of which usually chiefly draws the audiences' attention. At the first interval, one of them, who proved to be Yeoman Priscilla Cranstoun came out on the stage and made a speech.

Not an ordinary speech, as it only lasted a minute or two, but a very graceful one about how she liked being in the SPARS. Then, before the audience quieted down, the admiral popped up.

"In appreciation of the magnificent spirit of these girls," said he, in the voice of a man who has no doubt he would be heard a mile off in the face of a 60-mile gale, "and in appreciation of the service they are rendering their country, I propose three rousing cheers." He got them.

As it isn't every night the Pops gets an admiral, this one was too good to lose. He turned out to be none other than Vice Admiral Alexander Sharpe of the Command Service Force, U. S. N., in Boston on a brief mission with his aides, and making his first visit to the city's famed summer musicals. But as we said, something always happens at the Pops.

Musically, they went along just about as usual. Mr. Cherkassky, relieving Mr. Fiedler for the evening, conducted skillfully and with authority, securing good results from the orchestra. The program was a bit heavier than usual, but generally rewarding, and the audience was attentive and cordial all the way through. Of particular interest, perhaps, were the fine "Ruy Blas" overture of Mendelssohn and the rather rarely heard ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "The Demon." The opera is the only one of Mr. Rubinstein's 13 to survive, and that, as was evident last night, by the skin of its teeth.

E BOSTON HERALD, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 23, 1

SPARS SHINE AT POPS TONIGHT—Making certain that the Coast Guard's fight song, "Semper Paratus" heads the SPAR program tonight are, left to right, Priscilla Cranston, yeoman second class, Summit, N. J.; Maxine Renner, storekeeper third class, New Philadelphia, O.; and Arthur Fiedler, director of the Pops orchestra.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
JUN 13 1943

Koussevitzky Says Music Vital Need of Times in Urging Gifts Of Records for Fighting Men

Returning recently from a 35,000-mile tour of the fighting fronts, Lt. Gen. Henry H. Arnold, chief of the Army Air Force, reported that the only request made by our fighting men was for "some new phonograph records."

Yes, records have gone to war. And in a big way. You will find them in Army camps from coast to coast, in a dugout on Guadalcanal, at an advanced fighter base in North Africa. You will find them wherever American troops are, for records are an intimate link with the homes and the life they left behind.

And that thought comes from a group of American pilots stationed at an advanced air base "somewhere in North Africa." Interviewed by a war correspondent, they begged him to "tell the folks back home to ship us some more music. You can really use music in this country. It takes you a long way back home."

Pointing to a phonograph in a corner of the operations tent, one pilot said:

"That phonograph has got more operational hours than any plane in our squadron. If it ever wears out, we'll be in a fine pickle. We had about 150 records when we came, but there are about 100 left. A lot of them go tick, tick when the needle hits a crack, but they still give!"

Making records available to men in combat zones as well as in distant outposts off the beaten track of entertainers—a worthy cause—has become the concern of a group of leading recording, screen, and radio artists who are coordinating their efforts through the non-profit organization Records For Our Fighting Men, Inc. Last summer this organization enlisted the aid of the American Legion and other patriotic groups to collect old, used, and unwanted scrap records which were then sold to the record manufacturers. The funds thus obtained were used to purchase new records. To date, over 300,000 new records have been distributed to the fighting forces, here and abroad.

With unabated zeal, Records For Our Fighting Men will undertake its second nationwide drive to collect scrap records on July 3, with the American Legion and its Auxiliary again doing the house-to-house canvassing. Distribution of the new records to the men in service is again to be supervised by the Joint Army and Navy Committee on Welfare and Recreation.

One group of soldiers "somewhere in the South Pacific," learning that records and a phonograph were on their way, expressed for all our soldiers just exactly what music from home means. In a letter to the RCA Victor record department, the boys explained:

"Before, we had no communication with the outside world and that caused an epidemic of homesickness. But now everyone is looking forward to hearing the popular songs direct from home. I wish you could see this mob now—all smiles. Morale has gone up 100 per cent!"

In the camps, in the advanced bases, and even in the preliminaries just before battles, records are playing their part. In an article on the African invasion, a Saturday Evening Post writer, reporting from "abroad" a transport said:

"The ship had a public address system over which, every noon, phonograph records were played. The boys sang and whistled all day. Morale was excellent!"

Capt. Oscar Colcaire, stationed at Engineers Section Base Headquarters "somewhere in North Africa," wrote the RCA Victor record department about his reactions on the use of records in the war effort. Captain Colcaire, former record reviewer for the Arizona Daily Star, reports:

"There's a dearth of popular records in the camps. I remember one night I passed a hangar in which bunks had been placed. One of the men had brought over some records of Duke Ellington and the others—all a vintage of at least 12 months ago. There were these boys, most of them on their way up, listening with the rapt expression of all American youths when a favorite band was playing their favorite tune. War was a long way off that night, with most of them back in their home towns and with the girl of girls in their arms. I do believe that if those who do not think that records are important could see what a little music from back home does for their spirits, they would send over just as many records as they possibly could."

Yes, records have gone to war—and with telling effect. In the camps, on the front lines and in the war plants, where recorded music is being used to relieve worker's fatigue and freshen them up for renewed activity on the equally-important home production front. Morale, good morale, is vital and music is a vital factor in attaining it. As an Army sergeant, last stationed at Camp Wolters, Texas, put it:

"After a hard day of sweat, mud, double timing and just hard work, nothing is more relaxing and a better morale builder than music. We are players in the game of war. We have a job to do and will do our best. Many of us will have to give our lives. These records may be the last music many of these men will ever hear in this world. We shall perhaps never know how much this music inspired them to do their very best and give their all."

"Music," says Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "is a dominant need of our time. It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man."

And Dr. Koussevitzky's analysis is just another version of the expression of our fighting men when they follow their "Send us More Japs and Nazis" request with "Send Us More Records!" One way to get them more records is to gather our dusty, unused records together now and turn them over to the American Legion.

HAVE MUSIC AS THEY DO WORK

Lowell Factory Provides Morale Booster

Post June 2

LOWELL, June 15—More than 500 employees of a local cracker factory are doing their daily work to music. The idea, an innovation in Lowell, worked out successfully on all shifts at the plant today as employees performed their duties in unison with music that ranged from the popular swing tunes to the opera classics.

A loud speaker system has been installed and the volume of the music is such that it may easily be heard above the hum of machinery. Twenty minutes of each hour is given to the musical programmes. Plant officials said the idea bids fair to be entirely successful as a morale builder.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
JUN 10 1943

MUSIC FOR SOLDIERS

APPARENTLY there is conspiracy among professional entertainers, the radio folks and others to brand all men in the armed forces as morons. It seems that the only music considered is of the lightest and most "popular" sort. The mooning, bawling, crooning and trash have reached flood proportions. It seems to be assumed that no man in a uniform has ever heard good music or wants to hear any.

However, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and YEDHUDI MENUHIN and others of their sort have drawn tremendous crowds of service men to concerts of the highest grade. The discerning experts have found real hunger for better music. It is up to the musicians and thoughtful people generally to somewhat reverse the trend set up at the outset of the camp era; that trend was all to the banal side, under the insulting assumption that the minute a man puts on a uniform he loses his musical tastes and seeks to wallow in slop and drivel. Let it be realized that men carry much of their civilian dignity, taste and custom with them into military life and that they are not automatically converted to enthusiasm for trash and disdain of all culture and refinement.

[80]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JUN 16 1943

Music Today

Editor, the Daily Worker:

A proposal to aid the American composer has been made by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in a communication headed "Justice to Composers" published in the Sunday Times. After describing the disgraceful economic plight of these creative artists in America Dr. Koussevitzky declares "today we have no use for half-measures, for timid scattered efforts," and then—somewhat by way of anti-climax—proposes to solve the problem by soliciting an annual donation of $1 from each of the many thousands of performing musicians throughout the country, the sum thus obtained to be used as a composers' fund.

It is impossible for anyone acquainted with the handicaps under which the native composer functions not to sympathize with Dr. Koussevitzky's desire to do something about the problem. . . .

. . . There is, of course, only one solution of this problem, and everybody knows what it is. Dr. Koussevitzky himself indicates that he knows what it is when he remarks that "Russia, for one sensed the importance of art in this era of basic life reconstruction and offers every means of protection to her creative artists" (my emphasis — F. N.). . . .

Governmental subsidy of art is not essentially a question of Communism, nor even of socialism. Every country in Europe except England before the war was culturally civilized enough to have its Ministry of Fine Arts in one form or another, and will doubtless reestablish these agencies after the war. It is a question of civilization. Shall we encourage the fine arts through government aid, the only way in which they can be encouraged on a commensurate scale, or shall we, as uncivilized barbarians, go on seeing the arts perpetually under-nourished in America?

In any case any conference held to discuss the problem raised by Dr. Koussevitzky should:

1—Include on a national scale as many creative and performing artists, and as many music, dramatic, dance and art critics as possible.

2—Discuss and vote on a proposal to draw up, with legal aid, a bill to be introduced in Congress designed to establish and support opera houses, symphony orchestras, chamber music ensembles, choruses, ballets, painting and sculptural centers, together with the artists, creative and otherwise, essential to them, in every municipality throughout the country which offers to supplement Federal funds with a municipal grant of its own.

3—Undertake a national campaign to publicize the need for such action, and to ensure passage of the bill in Congress, soliciting for this purpose the aid of every critic, every artist, every writer, every commentator and every labor and cultural organization. . . .

FRANKLIN NEWMAN.

* * *

Mr. Newman proposes a solution already endorsed in its main outlines by such figures as Leopold Stokowski in a radio broadcast and Norman Corwin in the recent Panel Discussions on Arts and the Professions in the Present War.

The suggestion of our correspondent undoubtedly contains the elements of a constructive solution for the problem of the composer in our country. The creation of a Ministry of Fine Arts is long overdue. But we are now engaged in a war for survival and it is obvious that the energies of all people interested in the cultural future of our country must be directed to its speedy and victorious conclusion.

In this connection the failure of existing governmental agencies to utilize fully the abilities of our composers is nothing short of appalling, particularly when we have before us the example of our Soviet ally.

The columns of the Daily Worker have frequently referred to the use of music in the Soviet Union as a builder of morale both at the front and behind the lines. We need only mention the example of the composer Popov who accompanying troops into front-line action, celebrated heroic deeds in songs which were immediately sung by the soldiers. Our Army has recently commissioned certain artists to paint scenes of actual combat. Why cannot our composers be similarly utilized?

A concerted effort on the part of composers and musicians generally, cooperating with governmental bodies to use composers in the armed services, in industry and in civilian defense organizations is necessary if music is to do its full share in this People's War.

At the same time this work touching the daily lives of the people at so many different points would make the campaign for a Ministry of Fine Arts a truly popular struggle.

We welcome additional comments from our readers.

THE MUSIC COUNCIL.

DR. E. F. GOLDMAN

The second week of concerts by the Goldman Band, under the direction of Dr. Edwin Franko Goldman, brings a different type of program for each concert.

On Tuesday at Prospect Park, Brooklyn, only Grand Opera music will be rendered. Wednesday's concert in Central Park will be of a miscellaneous nature. The Thursday concert at Prospect Park will be All-Russian. In Central Park on Friday, another Grand Opera program will be played. Saturday's program in Prospect Park will not be devoted to any special type of music.

Many numbers never before heard at these concerts will be performed during the week.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Conservatory Pops

Students and alumni of the New England Conservatory gathered at Symphony Hall last evening for the annual Conservatory Night at the Pops. The entire floor was taken by the association.

Quincy Porter, director of the Conservatory, and Francis Findlay of the faculty were conductors and divided the program between them. To Mr. Porter's lot fell the Triumphal March from "Aida," the Overtue to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride;" Walter Piston's ballet music, "The Incredible Flutist;" the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "The Fire-Bird," and, as piece de resistance, the Tchaikovsky B-flat Piano Concerto. In the eridge Webster an able if not i

The New Eng Chorus, shrunke small complemer der Mr. Findlay from "Carmen," lilah" and "The and did them ni point of Mr. Fi was a beautifully accented perform waltz, "Tales Woods." Playin properly is no achievement as hullabaloo of Fu the Gladiators"

C. W. D.

[81]

REVIEWER APPROVES THE SEERSUCKER SYMPHONIES

Post May 25

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IT was unfortunate that the "seersucker symphonies," as a witty colleague dubbed the B. S. O.'s latest venture, should have been launched on the hottest Sunday in more than a month of them. With heat and humidity at reasonable summer levels, Harvard's Sanders Theatre should prove a cool retreat. Last Sunday it resembled an oven. When Boris Goldovsky concluded his performance of the solo part of Mozart's rare G major Piano Concerto his face glistened and not only from enthusiasm.

From time to time small segments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have broken off and functioned independently. One need only mention the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, of wind instruments, as typical and also famous examples. There have been other string quartets besides the Kneisel. The concerts of the Flute Players' Club have drawn largely on Symphony men, as have those of the Boston Society of Early Music; while Symphony players have been grouped in various chamber orchestras, the latest of which was the Zighera Orchestra that gave successful Jordan Hall concerts for three or four seasons but was not assembled in the one just ended.

What sets the new series of seven paired concerts apart from any of the above is the fact that it is sponsored by the orchestra itself and that it covers the fields of chamber orchestra, of choral music, of ancient music and its instruments, and of chamber music for both strings and winds. Probably for the first time all the principals (the "first desk" men, as they are commonly known) have been gathered together for one set of what may be called intimate concerts. Last Sunday's programme listed 16 of them. The soloists, exclusive of Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, and Boris Goldovsky, piano, who have already made their respective appearances, will be that indispensable pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, and the able harpsichordist, Putnam Aldrich.

The assisting groups are listed as the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, the Boston Flute Players Club and the Burgin String Quartet, together with members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. With no less than six conductors, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Leonard Bernstein, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Richard Burgin, this is indeed an ambitious project. It bears some relation to the activities at Tanglewood and quite obviously owes its existence to the fact that the Berkshire school and its incidental programmes have become a war casualty.

SMALL ORCHESTRA'S WORTH

A small orchestra is not necessarily an unsatisfactory substitute for a large one. It all depends on what the composer had in mind. If we go back to the days of Haydn and Mozart, not to mention Bach and Handel, we find that the orchestra meant something quite different from what that word connotes today. Therefore, when we hear a Handel or a Bach concerto grosso, a Mozart piano concerto or even a Mozart or Haydn symphony played with a full string complement of one of our great contemporary orchestras, we hear sounds and effects that the composer did not have in mind and that he might even disown if he could hear them.

Dr. Koussevitzky and other conductors will frequently reduce the body of strings for some of these elder works, but such moderate curtailment does not always accomplish the desired end. In the case of a concerto grosso the little group of soloists is still overwhelmed by the remainder of the orchestra. In a Mozart or Haydn score many an exquisite bit for the wind instruments get lost in the shuffle.

Orchestral richness and sonority are very fine in their way and most of us would be greatly distressed if we were to be permanently deprived of them. Nevertheless, it is very good for us to dispense with these luxuries once in a while and try to cultivate finer perceptions. The "seersucker symphonies" afford that chance.

ECONOMICS A FACTOR

The serious economic situation that obtained during and immediately after the last war turned the minds of composers toward the chamber orchestra. Great symphonies were not always obtainable. As a matter of fact, the trend in that direction had already begun as a natural and inevitable reaction to the orchestral megalomania which found expression first in certain works of Berlioz and Wagner and then in the later Strauss tone poems, in some of the symphonies of Mahler, in Schoenberg's "Gurrelieder," in Strauss' "Salome" and "Elektra" and in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which calls for eight horns and for woodwinds in fives. Mahler and Strauss, two of the most extreme examples of the other tendency, were among the first to react against it, the former in his song cycles with orchestra, the latter in his incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and in the exquisite opera, "Ariadne on Axos," which was originally part of the same musico-theatrical project.

The programme which Bernard Zighera will present at Sanders Theatre this afternoon and at New England Mutual Hall tomorrow evening well illustrates the several points that have just been made, and like all the others it runs to unfamiliar music. On it stands Schubert's little Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, scored, like Mozart's G minor, for an orchestra without trumpets or drums.

This delightful product of the composer's 20th year, last heard here at the concerts which marked the centennary of his death in 1928, is very much in the style and manner of Haydn and Mozart. A chamber orchestra should suit it well. It will be equally appropriate for the other numbers: the Scarlatti-Casella Toccata, Bourree and Giga; Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte"; Ibert's Capriccio; and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," after Pergolesi.

THE CONCERTS

The concerts of next Sunday afternoon and the following evening fall into two parts, the first of which will be given over to the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, and the second, directed by Leonard Bernstein, to compositions by Milhaud, Bowles and Stravinsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JUN 16 1943

Music Today

Editor, the Daily Worker:

A proposal to aid the American composer has been made by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in a communication headed "Justice to Composers" published in the Sunday Times. After describing the disgraceful economic plight of these creative artists in America Dr. Koussevitzky declares "today we have no use for half-measures, for timid scattered efforts," and then—somewhat by way of anti-climax—proposes to solve the problem by soliciting an annual donation of $1 from each of the many thousands of performing musicians throughout the country, the sum thus obtained to be used as a composers' fund.

It is impossible for anyone acquainted with the handicaps under which the native composer functions not to sympathize with Dr. Koussevitzky's desire to do something about the problem. . . .

. . . There is, of course, only one solution of this problem, and everybody knows what it is. Dr. Koussevitzky himself indicates that he knows what it is when he remarks that "Russia, for one sensed the importance of art in this era of basic life reconstruction and offers every means of protection to her creative artists" (my emphasis—F. N.). . . .

Governmental subsidy of art is not essentially a question of Communism, nor even of socialism. Every country in Europe except England before the war was culturally civilized enough to have its Ministry of Fine Arts in one form or another, and will doubtless reestablish these agencies after the war. It is a question of civilization. Shall we encourage the fine arts through government aid, the only way in which they can be encouraged on a commensurate scale, or shall we, as uncivilized barbarians, go on seeing the arts perpetually under-nourished in America?

In any case any conference held to discuss the problem raised by Dr. Koussevitzky should:

1—Include on a national scale as many creative and performing artists, and as many music, dramatic, dance and art critics as possible.

2—Discuss and vote on a proposal to draw up, with legal aid, a bill to be introduced in Congress designed to establish and support opera houses, symphony orchestras, chamber music ensembles, choruses, ballets, painting and sculptural centers, together with the artists, creative and otherwise, essential to them, in every municipality throughout the country which offers to supplement Federal funds with a municipal grant of its own.

3—Undertake a national campaign to publicize the need for such action, and to ensure passage of the bill in Congress, soliciting for this purpose the aid of every critic, every artist, every writer, every commentator and every labor and cultural organization. . . .

FRANKLIN NEWMAN.

• • •

Mr. Newman proposes a solution already endorsed in its main outlines by such figures as Leopold Stokowski in a radio broadcast and Norman Corwin in the recent Panel Discussions on Arts and the Professions in the Present War.

The suggestion of our correspondent undoubtedly contains the elements of a constructive solution for the problem of the composer in our country. The creation of a Ministry of Fine Arts is long overdue. But we are now engaged in a war for survival and it is obvious that the energies of all people interested in the cultural future of our country must be directed to its speedy and victorious conclusion.

In this connection the failure of existing governmental agencies to utilize fully the abilities of our composers is nothing short of appalling, particularly when we have before us the example of our Soviet ally.

The columns of the Daily Worker have frequently referred to the use of music in the Soviet Union as a builder of morale both at the front and behind the lines. We need only mention the example of the composer Popov who accompanying troops into front-line action, celebrated heroic deeds in songs which were immediately sung by the soldiers. Our Army has recently commissioned certain artists to paint scenes of actual combat. Why cannot our composers be similarly utilized?

A concerted effort on the part of composers and musicians generally, cooperating with governmental bodies to use composers in the armed services, in industry and in civilian defense organizations is necessary if music is to do its full share in this People's War.

At the same time this work touching the daily lives of the people at so many different points would make the campaign for a Ministry of Fine Arts a truly popular struggle.

We welcome additional comments from our readers.

THE MUSIC COUNCIL.

DR. E. F. GOLDMAN

The second week of concerts by the Goldman Band, under the direction of Dr. Edwin Franko Goldman, brings a different type of program for each concert.

On Tuesday at Prospect Park, Brooklyn, only Grand Opera music will be rendered. Wednesday's concert in Central Park will be of a miscellaneous nature. The Thursday concert at Prospect Park will be All-Russian. In Central Park on Friday, another Grand Opera program will be played. Saturday's program in Prospect Park will not be devoted to any special type of music.

Many numbers never before heard at these concerts will be performed during the week.

REVIEWER APPROVES THE SEERSUCKER SYMPHONIES

Post May 23

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

—BY WARREN STOREY SMITH—

IT was unfortunate that the "seersucker symphonies," as a witty colleague dubbed the B. S. O.'s latest venture, should have been launched on the hottest Sunday in more than a month of them. With heat and humidity at reasonable summer levels, Harvard's Sanders Theatre should prove a cool retreat. Last Sunday it resembled an oven. When Boris Goldovsky concluded his performance of the solo part of Mozart's rare G major Piano Concerto his face glistened and not only from enthusiasm.

From time to time small segments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have broken off and functioned independently. One need only mention the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club, of wind instruments, as typical and also famous examples. There have been other string quartets besides the Kneisel. The concerts of the Flute Players' Club have drawn largely on Symphony men, as have those of the Boston Society of Early Music; while Symphony players have been grouped in various chamber orchestras, the latest of which was the Zighera Orchestra that gave successful Jordan Hall concerts for three or four seasons but was not assembled in the one just ended.

What sets the new series of seven paired concerts apart from any of the above is the fact that it is sponsored by the orchestra itself and that it covers the fields of chamber orchestra, of choral music, of ancient music and its instruments, and of chamber music for both strings and winds. Probably for the first time all the principals (the "first desk" men, as they are commonly known) have been gathered together for one set of what may be called intimate concerts. Last Sunday's programme listed 16 of them. The soloists, exclusive of Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, and Boris Goldovsky, piano, who have already made their respective appearances, will be that indispensable pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, and the able harpsichordist, Putnam Aldrich.

The assisting groups are listed as the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, the Boston Flute Players Club and the Burgin String Quartet, together with members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. With no less than six conductors, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Leonard Bernstein, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Richard Burgin, this is indeed an ambitious project. It bears some relation to the activities at Tanglewood and quite obviously owes its existence to the fact that the Berkshire school and its incidental programmes have become a war casualty.

SMALL ORCHESTRA'S WORTH

A small orchestra is not necessarily an unsatisfactory substitute for a large one. It all depends on what the composer had in mind. If we go back to the days of Haydn and Mozart, not to mention Bach and Handel, we find that the orchestra meant something quite different from what that word connotes today. Therefore, when we hear a Handel or a Bach concerto grosso, a Mozart piano concerto or even a Mozart or Haydn symphony played with a full string complement of one of our great contemporary orchestras, we hear sounds and effects that the composer did not have in mind and that he might even disown if he could hear them.

Dr. Koussevitzky and other conductors will frequently reduce the body of strings for some of these elder works, but such moderate curtailment does not always accomplish the desired end. In the case of a concerto grosso the little group of soloists is still overwhelmed by the remainder of the orchestra. Mozart or Haydn score many an exquisite bit for the wind ...ost in the shuffle.

...ness and sonority are very fine in their way and most ... distressed if we were to be permanently deprived ... is very good for us to dispense with these luxuries ...ultivate finer perceptions. The "seersucker sym-

...t obtained during and immediately ... composers toward the chamber ...ays obtainable. As a matter ...dy begun as a natural and ... which found expression ...en in the later Strauss ... Schoenberg's "Gur- ...avinsky's "Rite of ...fives. Mahler ...ndency, were ...ycles with ...ourgeois ... was ...

them. And we'd be less than human if we weren't both proud and surprised at some of our accomplishments. For instance, in our engine repair shops we are making parts that we never dreamed of producing. And we are employing methods to keep our rolling stock moving which will be helpful to us after the war.

"And I am one who does not hesitate to say that the co-operation between railroads and the government has been splendid. More than that, the public has been co-operative. I know that I'm expected to say that, but the simple fact is that ...'s

...evening fall ... Boston Society ...ard Bernstein, to

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Conservatory Pops

Students and alumni of the New England Conservatory gathered at Symphony Hall last evening for the annual Conservatory Night at the Pops. The entire floor was taken by the association.

Quincy Porter, director of the Conservatory, and Francis Findlay of the faculty were conductors and divided the program between them. To Mr. Porter's lot fell the Triumphal March from "Aida," the Overtue to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride;" Walter Piston's ballet music, "The Incredible Flutist;" the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "The Fire-Bird," and, as piece de resistance, the Tchaikovsky B-flat Piano Concerto. In the last-named, Beveridge Webster of the faculty was an able if not impeccable soloist.

The New England Conservatory Chorus, shrunken by the war to a small complement of girls, sang under Mr. Findlay's direction pieces from "Carmen," "Samson and Delilah" and "The Flying Dutchman," and did them nicely. But the high point of Mr. Findlay's conducting was a beautifully paced, styled and accented performance of the Strauss waltz, "Tales From the Vienna Woods." Playing Strauss waltzes properly is not so common an achievement as many think. The hullabaloo of Fucik's "Entrance of the Gladiators" ended the evening.

C. W. D.

[81]

OF MUSIC

"SOLDIERS THREE" HAS ITS PREMIERE HERE THIS WEEK

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE March, "Soldiers Three," announced for performance at Tuesday evening's Esplanade Concert, belongs to that class of compositions known as musical curiosities. Even in this narrow field it is probably unique. In one sense or another musical collaborations such as "Soldiers Three" are fairly common. There are many cases where one composer has finished another's work or has orchestrated it. There are lots of popular pieces in which two men take credit for the music, and no one knows which or what part was written by whom—some one-finger geniuses can concoct a tune, but the harmony must come from another hand. Again there have been cases where composers have each contributed one of a set of variations or one movement of a string quartet.

But "Soldiers Three" is different from any of these. The first 24 measures, the last 16 of which are repeated with a second ending, were composed by Henry F. Gilbert. Stuart Mason wrote the next 24, and Edward Ballantine the 32-measure trio. The orchestral version through which the piece is being introduced to the public is the work of Carleton Beyer, assistant librarian and occasional trumpet player at Symphony Hall. As an encore, the piece was actually tried out at a recent Pop Concert, but Tuesday's performance is the official premiere.

And now to get down to the story of this singular opus: In 1926, Charles E. L. Wingate, then Sunday Editor of the Boston Post, thought it would be a fine idea to get three resident composers to collaborate on a march for Armistice Day. The man chosen to execute this commission was Laning Humphrey, now attached to the staff of Symphony Hall. Having hooked Mr. Gilbert first, not an altogether easy job, he had less difficulty in persuading the other two, although all three protested that military marches were not in their line and that they had never heard of any piece being written in just that way. The music was published in the Post and no doubt many of the readers tried it over on their pianos. There is no record, however, of a public performance, and it may be assumed that Mr. Beyer was the first to arrange it for either orchestra or band. The title, by the way, was Mr. Humphrey's.

THE SECOND CHAPTER

And so we come to the second chapter of this singular history. A few weeks ago this column was devoted to a review of Mr. Ballantine's second set of variations, in the style of ten composers, on "Mary Had a Little Lamb."

Mention of Mr. Ballantine brought to mind "Soldiers Three," a copy of which is preserved in one of this reviewer's clipping books. Mr. Humphrey read the article and in subsequent conversation with its author suggested that the March be resurrected and orchestrated; and Mr. Beyer was picked as a likely man for the job. (His orchestration of "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was one of the hits of the 1942 Pops.) Arthur Fiedler was interested, and there you are.

Mr. Beyer said the other day that some of the men in the Symphony who were perfectly well aware of Mr. Ballantine's date [illegible] seemed a bit hazy regarding the other two. This is a swiftly moving, rapidly changing world and sometimes those who step from life's busy stage are soon forgotten, even though the part they played on it was a prominent one. Mr. Gilbert died in 1928 at the age of 59 and Mr. Mason was taken the next year when he was only 46. As a composer the elder man was the more conspicuous figure. He was a bit of a pioneer in the matter of writing American music with a distinctively native flavor. Examples are his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," his "American Dances and Indian Dances" and his tone poem, "Dance in Place Congo," based on Creole tunes, which was made into a ballet and performed by the Metropolitan in both New York and Boston. The current issue of Modern Music contains an able and appreciative study of him by Elliott Carter.

Besides being a distinguished composer, Gilbert was something of a character. He was none too prosperous and this writer innocently asked him once why he did not supplement his income by teaching harmony.

"I can't remember the rules," was the terse reply.

As for Stuart Mason, he might be with us today if he hadn't done so many things at one and the same time. He was a busy teacher at the New England Conservatory; he was a composer of no mean attainments and a pianist (he assisted at the Boston Symphony performance of his "Rhapsody on a Persian Air" for piano and orchestra). For an extended period he was conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra and he also managed to be the music critic of the Christian Science Monitor.

THE PRESENT GENERATION

To turn to the present generation, a young conductor of promise, 24-year-old Leonard Bernstein, will direct the second half of today's concert by Symphony men at Sanders Theatre. Mr. Bernstein made his first appearances here as pianist when he was still a student at Harvard. There he composed music for plays and shows and directed under-graduate societies. At the Berkshire Music Centre he studied under Dr. Koussevitsky and became his first assistant. In the spring of 1942 he conducted the Jordan Hall performances of Aaron Copland's effective opera for young people, "Second Hurricane," and did an excellent job. More recently he conducted the New York premiere of Paul Bowles' chamber opera, "The Wild Remains," and will introduce a suite from that work to Cambridge today and to Boston tomorrow evening when the programme is repeated at New England Mutual Hall. He will also conduct four short "Symphonies" by Milhaud and the so-called "Dunbarton Oaks" Concerto of Stravinsky, still little known hereabouts.

The first part of the concert will be given over to the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, composed of four Symphony men, Paul Federovsky, Albert Bernard, Alfred Zighera and Gaston Dufresne. Assisted by Putnam Aldrich, harpsichordist, the four viol-players will present numbers by Couperin, Purcell, Gibbons, Handel and Susato.

[82]

...y in Cambridge

Orchestra's First-Desk Men Play Under Zighera's Lead

Bernard Zighera, much of a harpist and something of a conductor, led the front desk players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, yesterday afternoon, directing the first half of the program barehanded, and the second and better half with a stick. He was understudied at a spot in proceedings where a harp was required by Olivia Hall.

The group was improved over the last time by an additional double bass; for two basses not only produce a fuller sonority than one, but also provide a richer quality. The board pile which constitutes the stage of the old auditorium lent a charming and exhilarating resonance to the big bull fiddles played pizzicati.

It is a rare and choice opportunity indeed to be able to hear the early symphony No. 5 of Schubert, a perfect treasure, played by such an appropriate number of musicians. At first, one is quite set off guard by an eighteenth-century fragility, and thinks, "This is Mozart!" But a tell-tale bit of minor harmony in the first movement, a profusion of melody rather than contrapuntal development in the second movement, the German-waltz character of a few measures in major tonality in the minuetto, and the arrangement of skips in the second theme of the fourth movement—all are undeniably Schubert.

Two modern works concerned with early music were the Suite No. 1 from "Pulcinella," Ballet (after Pergolesi) by Stravinsky, and the Scarlatti-Casella "Toccata, Bourée, and Giga." Casella's renovating orchestration of Scarlatti, for such seems to be its primary function, added woodwinds, brass, yea even xylophone and triangle—and all was unexpectedly tolerable. Nevertheless, the tambourine and drum were the last and completely foreign straw. But even excluding this obtrusive percussion (which clamored conspicuously only in the toccata) and concentrating kindly on the larger part of the arrangement (which, to be sure, revealed skill and added much dash and variety) the question remains, was the musical substance improved for all this reconstruction?

Stravinsky's Suite No. 1 from Pulcinella, after Pergolesi, was a disjointed series of dances. Part of this disjuncture was the certain result in transference of ballet to concert hall. The other constituent in its disunion (which was its main musical fault) was its use of three separate styles, which alternated with the greatest obviousness. The first four numbers, with the exception of a few Stravinsky-like pedal notes and a more advanced instrumentation, employed almost too consistently Pergolesi's harmonies and melodies. With the entrance of the Toccata, a gay and wild Russian dance burst into the Italian calm. The Gavotte with two variations, the dullest section of the Suite, returned us, in melodic material at least, to Pergolesi. While from drole Duetto, between bass viol and trombone, to the clashing and often syncopated finale, the hands of Stravinsky becomes more and more defined. Truly, a hop-scotch affair.

Two other modern works completed the programme—the ingenuous Capriccio by Ibert, and the Pavane pour une Infante defunte (with jazz-associations) by Ravel.

Samuel Kitrosser

Bernard Zighera

CONDUCTOR DISCUSSES VALUE OF MUSIC

The following is the text of an address given by Mr. Koussevitzky at a symposium held at the Town Hall last week on "They Shall Have Music Wherever They Go." In this discussion of music for our armed forces Mr. Koussevitzky's subject was "Music in Our Civilization."

By SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

MUSIC is a dominant need of our time. It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for our future.

To realize the full significance of music amid the profound calamity of the present war we must glance back into the history of the past.

The effects of wars and revolutions upon the fine arts, and culture in general, have been twofold. Either the arts succumb to extreme materialism, demoralization and decay, or, to the contrary, they herald an epoch of cultural and spiritual rebirth, a release of new thought, new creative forces and a new age in history.

Within our generation and memory we have witnessed a period of excessive materialism and of a marked decadence in art as an after-effect of the First World War. Today, with the advent of the Second World War, we are living through a vigorous upswing of cultural forces and consciousness.

Such periods in history are periods of transition and of regeneration through human suffering and sacrifice; of reconstruction through a moral and spiritual rebirth and through the collapse of a decaying order of life.

Hoards of unholy forces have attacked, invaded and imperiled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressor and his devastating, demoralizing forces.

As we know, this is a war of the people as much as of the armies, of the artists as much as of the soldiers.

Every atom of artistic effort must be mobilized and thrown into action.

Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort and to inspire. In these stormy, perilous days it is the mission of art to protect the fundamental values for which our armies are fighting, to shelter the ennobling, everlasting treasures of art, to maintain the high standard of morale, of culture and thought.

Music is a living and active force which is essential for preserving the burning spirit and the lasting aspirations and ideals.

We have to fulfill the great and pressing task of carrying the torch of art and inspiration to the battle-front.

Millions of men-at-arms need our music. We cannot afford to waste time. The war goes on at a terrifying pace. Not for a day, not for an hour does bloodshed stop.

We have before us the matchless example of Russia, where art is a mighty weapon in the war.

Artists go to the front, into the heat of the battle, where they witness true heroism, and learn to know what is life and death, love and hatred. For those who know supreme love learn also to know profound hatred.

The fighting men despise and hate the merciless, inhuman enemy; they despise him for degenerating from a once cultured people into a slave and follower of a diseased mind and order, for sinking to the low stage of barbarism. They hate him for the cruelty to old and young, to woman and child, to innocent and weak; for the scorched earth, for the suffering of the mounting toll of victims.

The artist must experience the very depth of human emotion to give an illuminating account of it. In his work he must portray the intensity of human misery and endurance; the untold tale of tears and blood. He must arouse patriotic ardor and sacred wrath in the hearts of fighting men. He must inspire deeds of great heroism and valor. This is the mission of the artist today.

Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man.

Let us conquer darkness with the burning light of art.

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
JUL 29 1943

BACKS SMALL TOWN MUSIC

Musical Unicn Here To Co-operate In Petrillo Plan, Oscar Appel Says

Fund Authorized To Give 570 Concerts To Boost War-time Morale

The Baltimore local of the American Federation of Musicians will cooperate in the plan of James Caesar Petrillo, president of the parent union, to have the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and other major orchestras, play concerts in small towns, Oscar Appel, president of the Baltimore local said yesterday.

Mr. Petrillo announced his plan in New York yesterday, acting on the "suggestion of President Roosevelt." He said the national body has authorized the expenditure of a minimum of $250,000 and a maximum of $500,000 to furnish 570 "small-town" concerts to boost war-time morale.

To Be Notified Soon

The locals included in the program, Mr. Petrillo said yesterday in his New York office, will receive official notification today or tomorrow of their part in it and a general program to be followed by them.

The program, in general, he said, called for the actual concert schedule to be arranged by union locals.

"A city the size of Baltimore," he asserted, "should schedule from five to eight concerts."

The money already authorized, he added, would be used for the payment of musicians' salaries only.

Transportation costs will be paid by the parent body out of a separate fund, on receipt of bills from the locals.

However, the locals will be asked to pay conductors out of their local treasuries. But if they are financially unable to do so, the national body will stand part of all of the cost.

Mr. Appel explained that the union has no fixed ceiling for conductors and that the local would have to pay whatever is asked.

Willing To Cooperate

"Our treasury is in a healthy financial condition," he said, "but whether we could stand all of the cost for the conductor would depend on what amount was asked."

"We will be happy to give any number of concerts within keeping with our budget," he continued, "and will coopperate as much as possible with the national office."

Mr. Petrillo said the programs should begin "as soon as possible," and that all participating orchestras would schedule concerts for towns within their own State.

In addition to the Baltimore Symphony the program includes concerts by the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Petrillo Program Hit By Head Of NAB

New York, July 28 (AP)—Neville Miller, president of the National Association of Broadcasters, today said James C. Petrillo's plan to provide free symphonic concerts to the nation was a gesture "unequaled for hypocrisy."

"Mr. Petrillo," the NAB chief said, in a statement, "has done more to prevent symphonic music in the United States than any other man in the history of the country."

As president of the American Federation of Musicians, Petrillo last August banned union members from making musical recordings and radio transcriptions in an employment dispute with recording and radio companies.

"The good faith of Mr. Petrillo's proposal may be attacked . . . on the basis of his own figures," said Miller. ". . . Mr. Petrillo is allotting less than $10 a man per concert" to cover all expenses.

"It is obvious, therefore," Miller continued, "that Mr. Petrillo proposes to pay the men no compensation or only nominal compensation."

Petrillo, Miller said, contended that records used commercially in smaller cities deprived local musicians of employment opportunities.

"Yet," he added, "when the union sets aside $500,000 to bring some music to the American people, it does not employ local musicians. It should be noted that in making this transparent gesture, Mr. Petrillo drops the last vestige of justification for his ban on recordings."

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
JUL 28 1943

City Symphony On Petrillo's Tour List

Baltimore Orchestra Named For Small-Town Appearances

The Baltimore Symphony today was named by James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, as one of the major orchestras to participate in the union's plan to take big city symphonies to small towns.

A spokesman for the Baltimore Symphony, however, said the management had not been informed of the union's scheme and Oscar Apple, president of the Baltimore local of the AFM, said, "This is absolutely the first I've heard of the plan."

Roosevelt Suggestion

Petrillo, speaking in New York, said his union, acting on "a suggestion from President Roosevelt," had authorized expenditure of a minimum of $250,000 and maximum of $500,000 to give 570 free concerts in small towns to "boost wartime morale."

He said that specific arrangements for the concerts would be left to the various union locals, which will pay union scale wages to the musicians, meet all expenses and then submit bills to the Federation.

How Many?

"I don't know how many concerts the Baltimore Symphony will be called upon to give," said Mr. Apple. "I suppose I'll be told later."

Mr. Apple said that the maximum expenditure of $500,000 for 570 concerts would allow only $877 a concert.

"You can't move a big orchestra far on $877," he said. "Even if you don't pay salaries, $877 will only take an orchestra about 100 miles."

Union Scale Wages

Mr. Petrillo's statement failed to say how transportation costs and "union scale" wages could be covered by the sum appropriated. He also made no mention of the fees to be given conductors of the orchestras.

In addition to the Baltimore Symphony, such important orchestras as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra were named as participants by Petrillo.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 28 1943

Petrillo to 'Angel' Symphonies On a Tour of Smaller Cities

James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, announced yesterday that the union, acting on a suggestion by President Roosevelt, has appropriated $250,000 and is ready to appropriate $250,000 more to send the best symphony orchestras to small American cities for free war-time concerts.

In an interview at the federation offices, on the thirty-fourth floor of the General Electric Building, 570 Lexington Avenue, Mr. Petrillo sketched out the rough details of his program, which he said would begin to function within seven or eight days. Although he admitted that he had not discussed it with the various orchestra heads, he appeared to take it for granted that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the country's other major orchestral organizations would fall in with the plan.

Bruno Zirato, associate manager of the Philharmonic, said that it would be a matter for the board of directors of the society to decide and that, so far as he knew, the board had not heard of Mr. Petrillo's proposal officially.

Mr. Petrillo seemed hurt when he was asked whether the free concert plan was a public relations stunt connected with his ban on commercial music recordings by union musicians.

"I don't know anything about that," he said. "All I know is we're only trying to do the right thing."

According to a statement, the plan started in a conference with President Roosevelt on Dec. 29 at the White House.

"The President," the statement said, "was very much concerned that the people in the smaller cities in the United States are not getting enough first-class concert music, especially during war time.

"He pointed out to me that in many foreign countries concert orchestras are sent from city to city so that the people who are not in a financial position to travel to the big cities to hear the larger orchestras could hear the finest music free of charge. He was wondering whether or not the American Federation of Musicians could do something along the same lines. I told the President I would be very happy to take this matter up with the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, and I felt sure something could be done about it."

(Continued from page one)

The board, he said, acted on June 7 at Chicago, appropriating $250,000 outright and authorizing him to spend the other $250,000 if he found it necessary.

He said that the arrangement of the concerts will be left to the various union locals, which will pay union scale wages to the musicians, meet all expenses and then submit bills to the federation. The various orchestras, he said, will give the free concerts in sections which they can reach easily from their home cities.

The prepared announcement said that notification will be sent through local unions immediately to the following orchestras with instructions for them to play an allotted number of concerts:

Los Angeles Philharmonic, San Francisco Symphony, Washington Symphony, Chicago Symphony, Baltimore Symphony, Detroit Symphony, Minneapolis Symphony, Kansas City Philharmonic, St. Louis Symphony, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Rochester Philharmonic, Cincinnati Symphony, Cleveland Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony and Indianapolis Symphony.

The statement listed also fifty-five cities which have symphony orchestras that give occasional concerts. The implication was that they, too, would be requested to take part in the program.

Mr. Petrillo estimated that a total of 570 concerts could be given if the entire $500,000 is spent. "Some of the orchestras," he said, "may want to give two or three on their own."

He said that the larger orchestras would probably be the first to appear in the free concerts, since most of them were just finishing their seasons and had their organizations intact.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 30 1943

Philharmonic in Favor Of Petrillo's Tour Plan

Field Asserts Management 'Will Co-operate'

Bruno Zirato, associate manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, said yesterday that he had the assurance of Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic's board of directors, that the orchestra management "certainly will co-operate" with James Caesar Petrillo's plan to send symphony orchestras on tours to small cities for free war-time concerts.

Mr. Zirato spoke by telephone with Mr. Field, who is in Chicago. He said Mr. Field said of Mr. Petrillo's plan that "everything is all right in principle," and that he was "in favor of it," but that no details were worked out as yet. Mr. Zirato said that he had discussed the project with most of the members of the Philharmonic's executive committee and that they also agreed that the orchestra would co-operate, although a final decision rests with the entire board.

Mr. ePtrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, announced the plan on Tuesday and said the federation was ready to spend up to $500,000 to carry it out. Mr. Petrillo was not in town yesterday and at his office it was said that he would begin on Monday to work out the details in Chicago with the heads of the federation locals in western cities having symphony orchestras. These cities include San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Ore., Cincinnati, Chicago, ouston, Tex., and St. Louis.

On Tuesday or Wednesday Mr. Petrillo will meet in New York with union officials fro meastern cities having symphony orchestras. These cities include New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Washington and Rochester, Mr. Petrillo's assistant said. The meeting will be at the federation's headquarters, 570 Lexington Avenue.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
JUL 29 1943

FIVE CONCERTS TO BE PRESENTED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Lenox—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will direct five concerts at the Sedgwick hall under the auspices of the Lenox Library association. The proceeds will be to worthy charities and organizations, particularly the International Red Cross.

Dr. Koussevitzky is spending several weeks at Seraak, his summer home. The dates and further details will be announced con-

BRONX, N.Y.
HOME NEWS
JUL 28 1943

Music Union Will Give 570 Free Concerts for Nation's Smaller Cities, Petrillo States

Managers of leading symphony orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra today are studying the proposal of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to have members of the orchestras give free concerts in the "smaller" cities of the country.

Petrillo announced yesterday that in answer to a suggestion by Pres. Roosevelt, who deplored the fact that many Americans did not have the opportunity to see and hear the better musical organizations, the American Federation of Musicians had authorized an expenditure of $500,000 for 570 concerts.

Details of the scheme have not been discussed with the managers, Petrillo said, adding that he expected no opposition from this quarter. If there is, he indicated, the musicians would be billed as members of the various orchestras.

Cites Talk With President

Concerning his meeting with Pres. Roosevelt on last Dec. 29, at which the subject was broached by the President, Petrillo said:

"He (the President) pointed out to me," he said, "that in many foreign countries concert orchestras are sent from city to city so that the people who are not in a financial position to travel to the big cities to hear the larger orchestras, could hear the finest music free of charge.

"He was wondering whether or not the American Federation of Musicians could not do something along the same line. I told the President that I would be very happy to take this matter up with the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians and I felt sure something could be done about it."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUL 29 1943

NEW MILITARY TUNE

BOSTON, July 29.—(INS) "The Jap, the Hun." That's the name of a new military tune, written by a member of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and played by the orchestra at an outdoor concert last night. Jacobus Langendoen, cellist and composer, wrote the words and music. The audience joined with him in singing it.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES
JUL 28 1943

Petrillo Backs Symphony Tour To Small Towns

New York, July 28.—(AP)—A plan to present small town concerts by the country's leading symphony orchestras has been announced by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

Petrillo said the union had authorized expenditure of $250,000—and double that "if it is found necessary"—to send big city orchestras to small towns to present free concerts.

Petrillo announced that symphony orchestras of the following major cities would participate in the program:

Los Angeles, San Francisco, Washington, Chicago, Baltimore, Detroit, Minneapolis, Kansas City, St. Louis, New York, Rochester, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburgh and Indianapolis.

[93]

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
JUL 29 1943

BACKS SMALL TOWN MUSIC

Musical Unicn Here To Cooperate In Petrillo Plan, Oscar Appel Says

Fund Authorized To Give 570 Concerts To Boost War-time Morale

The Baltimore local of the American Federation of Musicians will cooperate in the plan of James Caesar Petrillo, president of the parent union, to have the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and other major orchestras, play concerts in small towns, Oscar Appel, president of the Baltimore local said yesterday.

Mr. Petrillo announced his plan in New York yesterday, acting on the "suggestion of President Roosevelt." He said the national body has authorized the expenditure of a minimum of $250,000 and a maximum of $500,000 to furnish 570 "small-town" concerts to boost war-time morale.

To Be Notified Soon

The locals included in the program, Mr. Petrillo said yesterday in his New York office, will receive official notification today or tomorrow of their part in it and a general program to be followed by them.

The program, in general, he said, called for the actual concert schedule to be arranged by union locals.

"A city the size of Baltimore," he asserted, "should schedule from five to eight concerts."

The money already authorized, he added, would be used for the payment of musicians' salaries only.

Transportation costs will be paid by the parent body out of a separate fund, on receipt of bills from the locals.

However, the locals will be asked to pay conductors out of their local treasuries. But if they are financially unable to do so, the national body will stand part of all of the cost.

Mr. Appel explained that the union has no fixed ceiling for conductors and that the local would have to pay whatever is asked.

Willing To Cooperate

"Our treasury is in a healthy financial condition," he said, "but whether we could stand all of the cost for the conductor would depend on what amount was asked."

"We will be happy to give any number of concerts within keeping with our budget," he continued, "and will coopperate as much as possible with the national office."

Mr. Petrillo said the programs should begin "as soon as possible," and that all participating orchestras would schedule concerts for towns within their own State.

In addition to the Baltimore Symphony the program includes concerts by the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Petrillo Program Hit By Head Of NAB

New York, July 28 (AP)—Neville Miller, president of the National Association of Broadcasters, today said James C. Petrillo's plan to provide free symphonic concerts to the nation was a gesture "unequaled for hypocrisy."

"Mr. Petrillo," the NAB chief said, in a statement, "has done more to prevent symphonic music in the United States than any other man in the history of the country."

As president of the American Federation of Musicians, Petrillo last August banned union members from making musical recordings and radio transcriptions in an employment dispute with recording and radio companies.

"The good faith of Mr. Petrillo's proposal may be attacked . . . on the basis of his own figures," said Miller. ". . . Mr. Petrillo is allotting less than $10 a man per concert" to cover all expenses.

"It is obvious, therefore," Miller continued, "that Mr. Petrillo proposes to pay the men no compensation or only nominal compensation."

Petrillo, Miller said, contended that records used commercially in smaller cities deprived local musicians of employment opportunities.

"Yet," he added, "when the union sets aside $500,000 to bring some music to the American people, it does not employ local musicians. It should be noted that in making this transparent gesture, Mr. Petrillo drops the last vestige of justification for his ban on recordings."

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
JUL 28 1943

City Symphony On Petrillo's Tour List

Baltimore Orchestra Named For Small-Town Appearances

The Baltimore Symphony today was named by James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, as one of the major orchestras to participate in the union's plan to take big city symphonies to small towns.

A spokesman for the Baltimore Symphony, however, said the management had not been informed of the union's scheme and Oscar Apple, president of the Baltimore local of the AFM, said, "This is absolutely the first I've heard of the plan."

Roosevelt Suggestion

Petrillo, speaking in New York, said his union, acting on "a suggestion from President Roosevelt," had authorized expenditure of a minimum of $250,000 and maximum of $500,000 to give 570 free concerts in small towns to "boost wartime morale."

He said that specific arrangements for the concerts would be left to the various union locals, which will pay union scale wages to the musicians, meet all expenses and then submit bills to the Federation.

How Many?

"I don't know how many concerts the Baltimore Symphony will be called upon to give," said Mr. Apple. "I suppose I'll be told later."

Mr. Apple said that the maximum expenditure of $500,000 for 570 concerts would allow only $877 a concert.

"You can't move a big orchestra far on $877," he said. "Even if you don't pay salaries, $877 will only take an orchestra about 100 miles."

Union Scale Wages

Mr. Petrillo's statement failed to say how transportation costs and "union scale" wages could be covered by the sum appropriated. He also made no mention of the fees to be given conductors of the orchestras.

In addition to the Baltimore Symphony, such important orchestras as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra were named as participants by Petrillo.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 28 1943

Petrillo to 'Angel' Symphonies On a Tour of Smaller Cities

James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, announced yesterday that the union, acting on a suggestion by President Roosevelt, has appropriated $250,000 and is ready to appropriate $250,000 more to send the best symphony orchestras to small American cities for free war-time concerts.

In an interview at the federation offices, on the thirty-fourth floor of the General Electric Building, 570 Lexington Avenue, Mr. Petrillo sketched out the rough details of his program, which he said would begin to function within seven or eight days. Although he admitted that he had not discussed it with the various orchestra heads, he appeared to take it for granted that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the country's other major orchestral organizations would fall in with the plan.

Bruno Zirato, associate manager of the Philharmonic, said that it would be a matter for the board of directors of the society to decide and that, so far as he knew, the board had not heard of Mr. Petrillo's proposal officially.

Mr. Petrillo seemed hurt when he was asked whether the free concert plan was a public relations stunt connected with his ban on commercial music recordings by union musicians.

"I don't know anything about that," he said. "All I know is we're only trying to do the right thing."

According to a statement, the plan started in a conference with President Roosevelt on Dec. 29 at the White House.

"The President," the statement said, "was very much concerned that the people in the smaller cities in the United States are not getting enough first-class concert music, especially during war time.

"He pointed out to me that in many foreign countries concert orchestras are sent from city to city so that the people who are not in a financial position to travel to the big cities to hear the larger orchestras could hear the finest music

(Continued from page one)

free of charge. He was wondering whether or not the American Federation of Musicians could do something along the same lines. I told the President I would be very happy to take this matter up with the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians, and I felt sure something could be done about it."

The board, he said, acted on June 7 at Chicago, appropriating $250,000 outright and authorizing him to spend the other $250,000 if he found it necessary.

He said that the arrangement of the concerts will be left to the various union locals, which will pay union scale wages to the musicians, meet all expenses and then submit bills to the federation. The various orchestras, he said, will give the free concerts in sections which they can reach easily from their home cities.

The prepared announcement said that notification will be sent through local unions immediately to the following orchestras with instructions for them to play an allotted number of concerts:

Los Angeles Philharmonic, San Francisco Symphony, Washington Symphony, Chicago Symphony, Baltimore Symphony, Detroit Symphony, Minneapolis Symphony, Kansas City Philharmonic, St. Louis Symphony, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Rochester Philharmonic, Cincinnati Symphony, Cleveland Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony and Indianapolis Symphony.

The statement listed also fifty-five cities which have symphony orchestras that give occasional concerts. The implication was that they, too, would be requested to take part in the program.

Mr. Petrillo estimated that a total of 570 concerts could be given if the entire $500,000 is spent. "Some of the orchestras," he said, "may want to give two or three on their own."

He said that the larger orchestras would probably be the first to appear in the free concerts, since most of them were just finishing their seasons and had their organizations intact.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 30 1943

Philharmonic in Favor Of Petrillo's Tour Plan

Field Asserts Management 'Will Co-operate'

Bruno Zirato, associate manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, said yesterday that he had the assurance of Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic's board of directors, that the orchestra management "certainly will co-operate" with James Caesar Petrillo's plan to send symphony orchestras on tours to small cities for free war-time concerts.

Mr. Zirato spoke by telephone with Mr. Field, who is in Chicago. He said Mr. Field said of Mr. Petrillo's plan that "everything is all right in principle," and that he was "in favor of it," but that no details were worked out as yet. Mr. Zirato said that he had discussed the project with most of the members of the Philharmonic's executive committee and that they also agreed that the orchestra would co-operate, although a final decision rests with the entire board.

Mr. ePtrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, announced the plan on Tuesday and said the federation was ready to spend up to $500,000 to carry it out. Mr. Petrillo was not in town yesterday and at his office it was said that he would begin on Monday to work out the details in Chicago with the heads of the federation locals in western cities having symphony orchestras. These cities include San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Ore., Cincinnati, Chicago, ouston, Tex., and St. Louis.

On Tuesday or Wednesday Mr. Petrillo will meet in New York with union officials fro measter cities having symphony orchestras. These cities include New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Washington and Rochester, Mr. Petrillo's assistant said. The meeting will be at the federation's headquarters, 570 Lexington Avenue.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
JUL 29 1943

FIVE CONCERTS TO BE PRESENTED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Lenox—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will direct five concerts at the Sedgwick hall under the auspices of the Lenox Library association. The proceeds will be to worthy charities and organizations, particularly the International Red Cross.

Dr. Koussevitzky is spending several weeks at Seraak, his summer home. The dates and further details will be announced concerning the concerts.

BRONX, N.Y.
HOME NEWS
JUL 28 1943

Music Union Will Give Concerts for Nation's Smaller Cities, Petrillo States

Managers of leading symphony orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra today are studying the proposal of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to have members of the orchestras give free concerts in the "smaller" cities of the country.

Petrillo announced yesterday that in answer to a suggestion by Pres. Roosevelt, who deplored the fact that many Americans did not have the opportunity to see and hear the better musical organizations, the American Federation of Musicians had authorized an expenditure of $500,000 for 570 concerts.

Details of the scheme have not been discussed with the managers, Petrillo said, adding that he expected no opposition from this quarter. If there is, he indicated, the musicians would be billed as members of the various orchestras.

Cites Talk With President

Concerning his meeting with Pres. Roosevelt on last Dec. 29, at which the subject was broached by the President, Petrillo said:

"He (the President) pointed out to me," he said, "that in many foreign countries concert orchestras are sent from city to city so that the people who are not in a financial position to travel to the big cities to hear the larger orchestras, could hear the finest music free of charge.

"He was wondering whether or not the American Federation of Musicians could not do something along the same line. I told the President that I would be very happy to take this matter up with the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians and I felt sure something could be done about it."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUL 29 1943

NEW MILITARY TUNE

BOSTON, July 29.—(INS) "The Jap, the Hun." That's the name of a new military tune, written by a member of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and played by the orchestra at an outdoor concert last night. Jacobus Langendoen, cellist and composer, wrote the words and music. The audience joined with him in singing it.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES
JUL 28 1943

Petrillo Backs Symphony Tour To Small Towns

New York, July 28.—(AP)—A plan to present small town concerts by the country's leading symphony orchestras has been announced by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL).

Petrillo said the union had authorized expenditure of $250,000—and double that "if it is found necessary"—to send big city orchestras to small towns to present free concerts.

Petrillo announced that symphony orchestras of the following major cities would participate in the program:

Los Angeles, San Francisco, Washington, Chicago, Baltimore, Detroit, Minneapolis, Kansas City, St. Louis, New York, Rochester, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburgh and Indianapolis.

[83]

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JUN 27 1943

Why Not Try Music Plan?

BY MARY LEIGHTON.

THE selection of Paul Creston's First Symphony, Op. 20, for the New York Music Critics' Circle Award, puts the spotlight on a composer who might be nominated as a beneficiary of the fund for creative musicians—if and when collections from performing musicians bring it into being in response to a proposal made by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

The details of Dr. Koussevitsky's proposal, published in the New York Times, May 16, and a report on controversial letters in answer to it, were published in my article two weeks ago. As a reminder, Dr. Koussevitsky pointed out that the composer of serious works is usally the poorest paid of musicians, and yet without him, solo performers, conductors, orchestras, bands, opera and ballet companies, choruses and other ensembles, publishers, instrument makers, inclusive of other organizations in the music industry, would not be able to function profitably. Dr. Koussevitsky also pointed out that we should not repeat the mistakes of former times when the greatest composers were handicapped by poverty, while they lived, only to meet untimely deaths before achieving general fame. A fund should be established by the country's musicians to aid American composers.

* * *

WHETHER Dr. Koussevitsky's plan has gained any more momentum, I do not know. The only subsequent remarks on the proposal I have observed is an editorial in Musical Courier from which I quote. "The Koussevitsky idea is admirable and its further development should be supported especially by musicians, for as the proponent says: 'We musicians should be first to stand by the composer, for we owe him most.'"

* * *

THE CASE of Paul Creston can serve to show how benefits might be derived from such a fund. The composer's real name is Joseph Guttoveggio. He was born on Manhattan's lower East Side. When he was 8 his father thought he had the makings of a concert pianist and bought him an old piano for $10. For 10 years he practiced diligently, and during spare time from improving his pianistic ability, composed little piano pieces. His formal education ended with his second year in high school. After that he began spending much time in study at the New York Public Library, acquiring a generous knowledge of crytography, graphology, occultism, Oriental philosophy, esthetics, acoustics. He is self-taught in musical composition, is not a member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, prefers to do business with American conductors and American orchestras himself and has been enterprising and successful to a degree in his individual ventures.

Creston won the Music Critics' award for the deft workmanship in his symphony, for the skillful cultivation of its musical structure, which demonstrated clear musical thinking. He also was praised because of its soundly wrought lyrical, rhythmic and contrapuntal elements which held contrast and balance and proved a worthy sounding orchestration. While the Music Critics' Circle, 13 in number, did not consider that the score reflected epochal individualism, its members concluded it is an interesting expression of a sound craftsman.

* * *

CRESTON is now 36, lives in a crowded three-room apartment in New York. The apartment houses a large library, a concert grand piano and his wife and two energetic children.

Probably this is an atmosphere of domestic happiness, but not one that is conducive to the peace of mind and profound thinking of a gifted musician.

If Paul Creston has accomplished what he has by his own resourcefulness and determination, relief from financial worries could further his creative powers. He teaches a number of piano pupils, plays the organ at Manhattan's St. Malachy's Church and composes. During the past six months, his compositions have brought him a scant $700 in performance royalties.

In fact that the careful judgment of the New York Music Critics' Circle resulted in favor for Creston's creative capabilities is significant for the financial recognition Dr. Koussevitsky has proposed.

Doubtless, the fund that he has suggested, to be established by musicians in this country for the benefit of American composers, would reap a rewarding harvest. If the popularity and far-reaching success of Jan Sibelius as the result of a permanent income from Finland is any argument for promoting Dr. Koussevitsky's proposal, his proposal should gather momentum immediately.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JUL 28 1943

Petrillo and Orchestras to Give Free Concerts for Small Cities

The union musicians of the leading symphony orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, and their conductors, are to give concerts free of charge in the smaller American cities, it was announced yesterday by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

Mr. Petrillo said that all expenses of the concerts would be met by the American Federation of Labor musicians union and that it had already authorized the expenditure of $500,000. He estimated that a total of 570 free concerts would be provided, with the first possibility being offered in a week or ten days.

The union leader said the plan was first suggested by President Roosevelt, but the White House had no comment to make on this announcement.

Mr. Petrillo said that he had been invited to the White House last Dec. 29 and that President Roosevelt was very much concerned that the people in the small cities in the United States were not getting enough first-class concert music, especially during wartime."

"He pointed out to me," Mr. Petrillo's formal statement continued, "that in many foreign countries concert orchestras are sent from city to city so that the people who are not in a financial position to travel to the big cities to hear the larger orchestras could hear the finest music free of charge.

"He was wondering whether or not the American Federation of Musicians could not do something along the same line. I told the President that I would be very happy to take this matter up with the international executive board of the American Federation of Musicians and I felt sure something could be done about it."

Mr. Petrillo said that he regarded it as "very significant that the President of the United States, with all the responsibilities he has during this crisis, found the time to think of the people in the smaller communities and provide an opportunity for them to see and hear the outstanding musical organizations in the United States."

Continued From Page One

The concerts will enable many persons to see and hear the major orchestras for the first time, Mr. Petrillo said, and in addition will do "a great deal for home morale during these distressed times."

No Difficulties Expected

Mr. Petrillo said that he had not yet discussed details of the project with the orchestra managers but that he did not expect any difficulties.

He said that he did not believe the managements would have any objection to the billing of the orchestras under their formalities. If there are objections, he said, they could be avoided by billing the musicians as members of the ensemble concerned.

Mr. Petrillo said that it had not been definitely decided in terms of population what would constitute a "smaller city." The aim of the program to bring the major orchestras to the smaller cities, he said, ended in itself any fears of competition with private enterprise.

According to Mr. Petrillo, each local of the federation will pick the playing dates and times for the orchestras within its jurisdiction. He emphasized, however, that the program would be flexible so that, if necessary, a band might travel an appreciable distance to fulfill the hopes of the project.

Dates for the concerts ordinarily will fall on the days off of the symphony musicians or during such times when they do not have commercial commitments. Mr. Petrillo said that the musicians would receive the regular union scale of pay for the concerts. The regular conductors of the orchestra would choose the selections to be played, Mr. Petrillo added.

At the present, Mr. Petrillo said, a schedule of concerts was not ready because some orchestras had disbanded for the summer. The concerts would be offered as soon as the units re-formed while those presently intact would lead off the series.

Mr. Petrillo said that the symphony orchestras of the following major cities would participate in the project:

Los Angeles, San Francisco, Washington, Chicago, Baltimore, Detroit, Minneapolis, Kansas City, St. Louis, New York, Rochester, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburgh, Pa., and Indianapolis.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUL 25 1943

New Program Wins Favor

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON — (AP) — Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have began a unique series of concerts—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the canceling of the Berkshire Festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about — obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire Festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Godovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Hafner" serenad (Goldovsky conducting) wit astonishing assurance and skil major piano concerto, Goldovsk sang three arias tastefully an all of the men performed ad mirably in the many solo pas sages.

Other musicians will have fur ther opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 1 concerts comes to an end.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

JUL 23 943

HOME OF THE BRAVE

BOSTON, July 23 (UP) — Nearly 14,000 persons, attending a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on the Charles river esplanade, halted their mad flight from a sudden electrical storm last night to stand in the driving rain while the orchestra finished playing "The Star-Spangled Banner."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JL 23 943

—(U.P.)

* * *

NEARLY 14,000 persons, attending a Boston symphony orchestra concert on the Charles River Esplanade, halted their mad flight from a sudden electrical storm last night to stand in the driving rain while the orchestra finished playing "The Star-Spangled Banner."—(U.P.)

This Clipping from
NEW KENSINGTON, PA.
DISPATCH

JUL 24 1943

The World of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is experimenting this summer with a series of seven concerts suitable for orchestra of chamber proportions, although not all of it is written as "chamber music."

Under seven different conductors, all the principal players of the Boston Symphony will take part, with such others as are needed. The music selected ranges from Bach and Scarlatti to modern and even contemporary composers. One program, for instance, will be made up of works by Haydn, Handel, Wagner and Shostakovich.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

JUL 2 1943

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

JUN 27 1943

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is always good copy, especially in the eyes of the New York Times' Olin Downes. Now he has kicked up quite a to-do in suggesting that performing musicians should do something in the way of financial support of America's composers—to allow them freedom and peace of mind in their creative activities. Whether you choose to deem this as a serious or merely amusing idea, the letters of response which it evoked proved to be the most amusing collection of side-stepping and buck-passing noted in a long time.

All agreed that the idea is a good one. But, who will pay? Some one points to ASCAP. Its president, Deems Taylor, explains that that organization already pays out twenty per cent of its royalties to composers of serious music. Some meanie opines that the musicians' union should be happy to assume the honor, then a union member replies that that idea is naive, to say the least. Another suggests a federal ministry of fine arts for subsidization of these men and is answered in terms of WPA, communism and socialism.

One writer calls attention to the millions of dollars laid out by industry for laboratory research by its scientists in the hope that in the course of one or ten years they will hit upon something as valuable as nylon has proved for the Du Ponts. His conclusion contends that if this sort of gamble proves practicable and profitable for industry the music world could well gamble in a similar manner on its creative geniuses.

But some one will ask—if nylon is worth millions, how much is a Beethoven symphony worth? Another will aver that the question is too silly for consideration and a third will contend that the Beethoven symphony has done and will continue to do more for humanity than all the nylon that can be fabricated—that money values can no more be placed on that symphony than on your child.

Of course the rub comes in trying to pick the winners before they have run. If, by some magic, we knew we had another Mozart or Schubert, this country, in war or peace, would not let him want. There would be no paupers' graves as for those two—no Charles Griffes burning himself out as a young man composing all night after having taught all day—no Henry Gilbert minding a horse and a cow so he could put a piano in the barn and write music on a bread-board laid over the head of a barrel.

On the other hand Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowski, Dvorak and many another big-wig composer left estates that were not exactly hay.

Boston Pop Orchestra In Open-Air Concerts

The famous open air esplanade concerts presented by the Boston Pops Orchestra along the picturesque Charles river each summer will be broadcast over KRMD and the Blue Network for the musical enjoyment of the millions of patrons of the world-renowned orchestra.

The opening concert, tonight at 7:15, will be dedicated to the WAVES, in celebration of their first anniversary.

A group of 500 WAVES will march in a body, led by a military band from their training school to the esplanade.

High ranking naval officers will be in attendance, and tribute will be paid to the event, to be known as "Women's Reserve Night."

Four esplanade broadcasts will be heard over KRMD and the Blue Network, from 7:15 to 8:00, instead of the usual closing time of 8:15. This is due to dim-out regulations. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

Temporary Suspension

WAR CONDITIONS have made it necessary to suspend temporarily activities of the Berkshire Music Center, although a committee composed of members of the boards of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Berkshire Symphonic festival and the Koussevitzky Music foundation had been formulating plans for continuing the center this summer.

Announcing the suspension, Serge Koussevitzky said: "Cultural education and activities are now necessarily being curtailed in many directions. But after this period of sacrifice, of deprivation and of terrific concentration on the immediate tasks of the war effort, students of all ages, and the public as well, will turn to the Berkshire Music Center and other institutions of art, deepened by their experience and with a greater need and appreciation for the arts and especially for music. It is for us to use this time to prepare now so that we shall stand ready to meet their need with even greater resources for usefulness, help and inspiration."

Plans are already progressing for reopening the center as soon as war conditions permit, and for assuring the continuance on the basis of nation-wide interest and support.

The center will continue its service in offering opportunities to young musicians, and will play an important part in rehabilitating the skill of many who have had temporarily to lay aside their musical work, it is announced.

San Francisco, Cal
People's World
June 23, 1943

Composers Win

NEW YORK (UP).—The Koussevitzy Music Foundation has approved grants for symphonic compositions to be written by Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok and William Schuman, and for chamber music compositions by two young American composers, William Bergsma of the Eastern School of Music and Robert M. Palmer, University of Kansas. This is the second series of grants by the foundation, which was set up in 1942 in memory of Natalie Koussevitzy.

This Clipping From MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUL -- 1943

LISTENING with the KOUSSEVITZKYS

These interesting reminiscences are published to commemorate the Silver Jubilee of Arthur M. Abell's valued connection with the Musical Courier. He wrote his first article for this paper in 1893, when he was living in Weimar, Germany. In 1894 he moved to Berlin and acted as our representative there for many years, until he returned to this country and retired from active journalism. His reviews and essays in our columns were among the most informed of their time. As an authority on matters concerning the violin, its repertoire and its players, he still has few superiors. During Abell's Berlin residence, his home was a salon where the most distinguished resident and visiting musicians gathered for receptions that were among the leading events of their kind in the German capital. Mr. and Mrs. Abell are now living at their country home in Hastings-on-Hudson, N. Y.—EDITOR'S NOTE.

By ARTHUR M. ABELL

During the past sixteen years it has been my privilege and that of Mrs. Abell to be the guests of Serge Koussevitzky in his box at Carnegie Hall for all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts there, 160 during this period. Many famous musicians have been our fellow-guests during this decade and a half, and some of their comments and sayings were of such general interest that they deserve to go on record.

In telling the story of the Koussevitzky box, I shall touch, of course, on only the highlights.

Dr. Koussevitzky and I have been friends for forty-five years, since he made his Berlin debut in 1898 as a double bass virtuoso. The older readers of the Musical Courier will recall that I was his guest on that memorable tour of the Volga which he made with his own orchestra of eighty-three musicians in the spring of 1914. He chartered a steamer and traveled for more than 2,000 miles down Europe's mightiest river, giving concerts in all the principal cities from Jaroslav to Astrakhan. At Stalingrad, the scene of the greatest battle thus far of this war, he gave two concerts. The town was then called Zaritza. I wrote a series of articles for the Musical Courier at the time about that unique musical pilgrimage.

A Distinguished Roster

Many distinguished musicians have been fellow guests with us in the Koussevitzkys' box during these sixteen years. Among them were Koussevitzky's co-workers in the conductorial vineyard, the late Frederick Stock of Chicago, Carlos Chavez of Mexico City, Fernandos Arbos of Madrid, Georg Schneevoigt of Helsingfors, Gregor Fitelberg of Warsaw and Artur Rodzinski of Cleveland. Among the violinists have been Jan Kubelik, Bronislaw Huberman, the late Paul Kochanski, Nathan Milstein and Lea Luboshutz. Other guests were the Russian cellists Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova; and Artur Schnabel, whose feat of playing from memory all of the thirty-two Beethoven piano sonatas in seven recitals at Carnegie Hall a few years ago will long be remembered.

Among the composers besides Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Ravel have been Alexandre Tansman, the late Charles Martin Loeffler, Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions, Nicolai Berezowsky, Arthur Lourié (who is also the biographer of Koussevitzky), Edward Burlingame Hill and Vladimir Dukelsky. (Vernon Duke when he writes popular music.) The famous contralto, Margarete Matzenauer, was also a guest on two occasions. The late Philip Hale was with us once, and last winter there sat in the box a striking-looking young blonde girl in whose veins flows the blood of two of the greatest men of all musical history, Friedelind Wagner, the freedom-loving granddaughter of Richard Wagner and the great-granddaughter of Liszt.

For thirteen consecutive seasons Mme. Koussevitzky always received her guests with queenly grace and that delightful simplicity of manner so characteristic of educated Russians of the old régime. Since her death, her niece, Olga Naumoff, has quietly and charmingly officiated as hostess. I first met her when she was a little girl, at Samara, on the Volga, in 1914.

Gifted Occupants

Mme. Chaliapin, widow of the great Feodor, has been with us regularly for several seasons, and Michel Kachouk, who was for twenty years Chaliapin's manager. Dr. Paul Stefan, biographer of Toscanini and Dvorak, has also been there several times.

An ever-welcome guest is the famous French pianist and pedagogue, Isidor Philipp, who, with his gifted assistant, Emma Boynet, has been with us repeatedly during the past two seasons. Arthur Nikisch's daughter, Leonore Nikisch-Schindler, was with us at one concert last season, also her husband, Ewald Schindler and their son, Andreas, the only living grandson of the unforgettable Nikisch.

Among the many interesting features of the Koussevitzky box during these sixteen years have been the many languages spoken there. Chief among these were Russian and French, but Italian, German, Spanish, Dutch, Polish and Finnish have also been heard.

Memories and Music

Three years before his death, Ossip Gabrilowitsch listened with us to Koussevitzky's inimitable rendition of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, and during the intermission told us how he had heard the world premiere of the work at St. Petersburg, conducted in the fall of 1893 by Tchaikovsky himself only a few days before the composer's death. Incidentally, the writer was present at Gabrilowitsch's sensational Berlin debut in 1896.

While he was still living in New York, Jascha Heifetz was a frequent guest of the Koussevitzkys. His attractive wife, formerly Florence Vidor of screen fame, was always with him. One Saturday afternoon after the concert Heifetz invited the Koussevitzkys and all of us who were their guests in the box for a social hour in his Park Avenue penthouse apartment, with its enormous music room and two concert grand pianos.

Chaliapin Sings for Tolstoy

At one of the concerts some twelve years ago, the late Feodor Chaliapin was one of the guests. During the pause he told us of his long friendship with Koussevitzky, and how they had concertized together in Russia as young men. It was at Koussevitzky's home in Berlin in 1907 that I first met Chaliapin. The great basso also told us how he and his boyhood friend, Sergei Rachmaninoff, visited Leo Tolstoy in 1900. His account of this event was very vivid, and as everyone is now reading Tolstoy's War and Peace, I shall tell the story in Chaliapin's own words:

"I was in an indescribable state of excitement," he said, "when I finally stood face to face with the great man whose name was a household word throughout the civilized world. Tolstoy asked me to sing something, which I did to Rachmaninoff's accompaniment. To my great astonishment, he gave no sign either of

(Please turn to page 9)

KOUSSEVITZKY ON THE PODIUM. Conducting is not the only artistic talent in the Serge Koussevitzky family, as the accompanying drawing shows. Made from life, at a concert, it is from the pen of his niece, Olga Naumoff. With remarkable economy of line, the sketch strikingly characterizes the noted conductor.

← COMPOSER AND CONDUCTOR COMPETE IN CHINESE CHECKERS

with a watchful referee. Left to right, Vladimir Golschmann, Mme. Igor Stravinsky and Igor Stravinsky. Mr. Golschmann directed the first performance of Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes at the recent Serenades in the Museum of Modern Art, New York.

Photo by Halsman, N. Y.

AT THE HOME OF ARTHUR M. ABELL →

in Hastings-on-Hudson, N. Y., a group of musical personalities includes, seated, Isidor Philipp and Emma Boynet, pianist; standing, Mr. Abell, left, and Dr. Paul Stefan, musicologist.

LISTENING FROM THE KOUSSEVITZKY LOGE

(Continued from page 5)

approval or disapproval. For me, this silence and indifferent attitude were very depressing.

"A word of praise from the famous author would have meant so much to me at that time, when I stood just on the threshold of my career. Sofia Andrievna (the Countess Tolstoy), however, was very enthusiastic and asked me to sing again, which I did. This time I noticed that tears trickled down Tolstoy's cheeks.

"Sofia Andrievna took me to one side, saying, 'For heaven's sake don't let Leo Nicolaievitch know that you saw his tears. He would never forgive you if you did. But, you see, your singing did move him.'"

Glazounoff and Ravel Agree

When in this country a decade or more ago, the late Alexander Glazounoff was a guest in the box several times. On one occasion Koussevitzky played Maurice Ravel's Bolero, which was at that time all the rage. Glazounoff had never heard it. I asked him what he thought of it and he replied, "I think it is third-rate music, and wholly unworthy of so gifted a composer as Ravel."

This comment interested all the guests greatly, for it coincided with Ravel's own opinion of the work. The famous Frenchman sat in the box at one of the concerts during the season of 1928-9 and listened with great interest to Koussevitzky's reading his Suite, Ma Mère l'Ore. In voluble and rapid French, Ravel went into raptures over Koussevitzky's magnificent performance of the work. He was particularly impressed with the Boston Symphony. "We have nothing in France," he declared, "that can be compared with it."

In speaking of his Bolero, which all the orchestras were then playing, Ravel commented, "I consider it one of my least significant works, and its popularity is a great surprise to me and out of all proportion to its musical value."

Enter Thomas Mann, the Gishes and McCormack

Thomas Mann and his wife have been in the box at various times. He is quite musical and revealed an intelligent understanding of the classics in particular. He told me that he had studied the violin in his youth at Lübeck. On one occasion, in discussing Hitler, he said, "It is a mystery to me that a nation that has produced such giants as Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could be led astray by such a madman The Nazis have nothing in common with the men who made Germany a great nation."

Lillian and Dorothy Gish were with us several times some years ago. On one occasion John McCormack entered the loge, and on seeing them he enthusiastically exclaimed, "Sure, and it's a sight for sore eyes to look on the two of you!" During the pause he regaled us in his inimitable brogue with funny Irish anecdotes.

Some twelve years ago Ernst Toch's enormously difficult new Concerto for piano was being played by Jesús María Sanroma. Toch himself, with his charming wife, sat in the box with us. At the conclusion of the performance a French wit, who was present, exclaimed, "Grand Dieu! C'est un concerto du diable joué par Jésus!"

Serge Prokofieff was soloist with Koussevitzky at two concerts. He played his third and fifth piano concertos, and after the performance of these he sat in the box with us to hear the remainder of the program. His comments on standard classical works that Koussevitzky was performing were most amusing. Brahms, in particular, came in for his special condemnation. According to Prokofieff, nothing that Brahms ever wrote was worthy of being played in our day!

Some Stravinsky Mots

A different opinion of the third great German B was expressed by Prokofieff's illustrious compatriot, Igor Stravinsky, who has been with us in the box on several occasions in recent years. His admiration for Brahms is profound. When Mme. Koussevitzky told him that I had known Brahms, he was intensely interested and asked me many questions about the great composer.

At one of the concerts which Stravinsky attended, Sanroma was again soloist, performing that composer's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Stravinsky remarked, "I have done the Capriccio myself forty-two times in public with orchestra, but this is the first time I have ever heard another pianist play it." I said to him, "What a great difference there is in style and treatment between this and your earlier works, such as Oiseau de Feu, Petrushka and Sacre du Printemps."

"That is true," he replied, "but a quarter of a century has passed since I wrote them, and in those twenty-five years I have grown—I should hope."

Godowsky Defines Genius

A frequent and always welcome guest to the Koussevitzky box was the late Leopold Godowsky. As those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship well know, that great man was famous for his penetrating analyses of music and musicians, for his repartee, ready wit and epigrammatic comments. On one occasion I asked him how he distinguished between talent and genius.

Quickly he replied, "Talent is evolution, genius is revolution."

SICIAN—the one who gave birth to musical art, whose work and genius are responsible for this extraordinary prosperity and flowering of musical life—and who has brought the beauty and joy of music to the world? What has been the fate of the composer of the past? What is being done for the composer of our day?"

Dr. Koussevitzky builds up a strong case for the great composers of the past who lived and died in privation, poverty and obscurity. "Those Titans, who today are the pillars upholding the towering structure of musical art, were ignored by their contemporaries and allowed to die of heartbreak and misery. The monuments built in their honor, the deepening recognition of their immortality, will not erase the injustice allowed in their day." He continues to say that the present-day composer may not die of heartbreak and hunger but has to struggle along "to earn his living through other ways and sources than his God-given gift; as a composer he cannot make a living. He is forced to go out and teach, lecture, and crowd his day with trifling obligations which kill his time, his energies, his creative art. If his present-day life is less tragic it is none the less hard, unfair and maladjusted."

Dr. Koussevitzky declares that it is time to repay the debt of long standing which we owe the composer. He cites the example of Russia which "sensed the importance of art in this era of basic life reconstruction and offers every means of protection to her creative artist." He feels that this is the moment, while "America is fully conscious of the mission to restore the rights of men to protect the intellectual, creative and cultural forces from the deadly grip of Teutonic strangulation," to make an appeal on behalf of the composer in line with deep-rooted American tradition. "The appeal for the composer must embrace the whole musical world, reach the musician in every field, the music lover and sponsor, far and wide. It calls for the invaluable support of great music federations; for the joint cooperation of organizations and institutions vitally active in musical life; for the wide spread response of all those who derive enjoyment and inspiration from music.

"We musicians must be first to stand by the composer because we owe him most." Dr. Koussevitzky's plan is to ask a small annual donation of $1.00 from each performing musician which would bring in a substantial permanent income, with the joint cooperation and contribution of other groups and organizations, to form a composers' fund.

• • •

Roy Harris Receives Commission For Symphony

The first move in the direction to help the American composers as suggested by Dr. Koussevitzky was a commission from the National Broadcasting Company, announced by Mark Woods, President of the Blue Network, at a reception at the Waldorf-Astoria, May 17. Mr. Woods announced that he had commissioned Roy Harris to write a new symphony. He also made the statement that he made no demands on the composer, but hoped that the new work would be an expression of the nation's war effort. He said: "Since Roy Harris is essentially a man of the soil and one of our own, I hope his sixth symphony will be dedicated to the American fighting forces and that it will be a symbol of the struggle which our nation is making and has made throughout its eventful history for the freedom of mankind." Mr. Harris, in accepting the commission said that he would compose a "major moral symphony" that would deal with the Lincoln era which is as significant today as were the trying times of Lincoln's Presidency. Mr. Harris's Fifth Symphony was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union and was played by the Boston Symphony this winter. It was heard by short wave in Russia and a group of Soviet composers, including Prokofieff, Shostakovich and Miaskovsky, sent the American composer congratulations by cable.

• • •

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 4 - 1943

NEW BOSTON SERIES

As an innovation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs will be under the direction of a different conductor and will be performed in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, beginning July 18, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual Hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston Symphony will appear and such others as are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists will comprise Jesús Maria Sanromá, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and others.

The series opens, July 18 and 19, with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky. It contains the Divertimenti in D (K. 251) and in E flat (K. 113); three arias with Mrs. Goldovsky as soloist; the "Haffner" symphony, and the piano concerto in G. The last named work will be played by Mr. Goldovsky and conducted by Mr. Burgin.

The second program, July 25-26, directed by Mr. Zighera, will consist of a Toccata, Bourrée and Gig by Domenico Scarlatti; Schubert's Fifth symphony; Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite; Ibert's "Capriccio" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte."

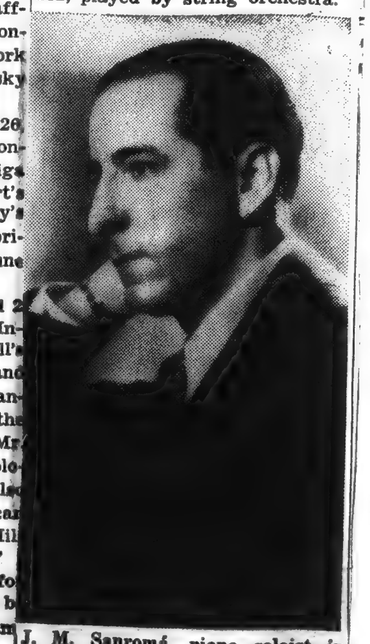
At the concerts of Aug. 1 and 2 the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments will be heard in Purcell's first and seventh "Fantasies," and works by Couperin, Gibbons, Handel and Gervaise. The rest of the offerings will be conducted by Mr. Bernstein, who will appear as soloist in Poulenc's "Aubade," and also will present "Three Mexican Dances" by Paul Bowles and Milhaud's "La Création du Monde."

Piston's "Three Pieces" for flute, clarinet and bassoon will be a feature of the fourth program Aug. 8-9, to be directed by Mr. Laurent, which lists further Jongen's "Rhapsody" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and piano; Mozart's quartet (K. 285) for flute, violin, viola and 'cello, and the Beethoven septet.

The fifth program, Aug. 15 and 16, under Mr. Woodworth's direction, will be composed of Bach's concerto in A minor for flute, violin, harpsichord and strings; Haydn's symphony No. 80, in F major, and Mozart's "Requiem Coeli," for chorus, soprano solo and orchestra.

On Aug. 22 and 23 Mr. Curtis will lead Handel's "Water Music"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Haydn's symphony in B flat, on a schedule also embracing Shostakovich's piano quintet, performed by Mr. Sanromá and the Burgin Quartet.

The final program, Aug. 29 and 30, conducted by Mr. Burgin, will be devoted to works for strings, including the Arensky "Variations"; Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," Volkmann's "Serenade" for 'cello and strings, and also Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 132, played by string orchestra.



J. M. Sanromá, piano soloist in Gershwin program Tuesday.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JUN - - 1943

Aid For The American Composer

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has always championed the cause of the American composer. In the New York Times of May 16, he wrote a letter showing the phenomenal development of music as an art and a profession. He speaks of the development through music organizations, conservatories, orchestras and federations of music in this country. Artists "come to light, to glory, to wealth." He speaks of the rise to fame of orchestras, of the prosperity of radio, phonograph and publishing corporations, of the expansion of music federations which enlist hundreds of thousands of members. Music needs the performer. "It needs the ever widening realm and new vistas opened up by interpretative art. To be sure, the performing musician deserves the protection which his profession affords him; the artist-interpreter deserves recognition of the services he renders to the art of his election. BUT WHAT IS THE REWARD OF THE CREATIVE MU-

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
JUL 5 - 1943

Chamber Music Series Set

The opening concert in the annual "Midsummer Night" chamber music series will be held in the east rose garden of the Baltimore Museum of Art at 8.30 P. M. tomorrow. Concerts will be held each Tuesday at the same hour throughout the summer until August 24.

The program tomorrow includes the Mozart Piano Quartet in A Major, the Brahms String Quartet in A Minor, Opus 51, No. 2, and the Quintet in E Flat Minor, Opus 26, by Dohnanyi. Featured performers will be the Homewood Quartet, including Veda Reynolds, assistant to Efrem Zimbálist at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, first violin; Melvin Ritter, Peabody Conservatory scholarship student and member of the Baltimore Symphony, second violin; Alexander Fisham, of the National Symphony Orchestra, viola, and Mischa Niedeman, who will join the Boston Symphony next winter, cello. Richard Goodman, Baltimore musician, will be pianist.

The Baltimore Museum of Art will open its fifth annual Summer Sketch Club for children between the ages of 5 and 15 tomorrow morning. Classes will be held for white children on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and for colored children on Friday. They will last from 10 A. M. to noon and will be held through August 13.

[86]

Records Sought for Concerts at Fronts

An impromptu pops concert with phonograph records in a Nissen hut in far-off Dutch Harbor led last night to a movement to supply records for other such programs on all American fronts.

A letter from a New York Navy man to Arthur Fiedler, pops conductor, describing the sub-arctic program, inspired the idea at the Fort Devens night program of the Boston Pops concert in Symphony Hall. A WAAC detachment from Fort Devens was given the task of starting the collection of records.

LISTENING FROM THE KOUSSEVITZKY LOGE

(Continued from page 5)

approval or disapproval. For me, his silence and indifferent attitude were very depressing.

"A word of praise from the famous author would have meant so much to me at that time, when I stood just on the threshold of my career. Sofia Andrievna (the Countess Tolstoy), however, was very enthusiastic and asked me to sing again, which I did. This time I noticed that tears trickled down Tolstoy's cheeks.

"Sofia Andrievna took me to one side, saying, 'For heaven's sake don't let Leo Nicolaievitch know that you saw his tears. He would never forgive you if you did. But, you see, your singing did move him.'"

Glazounoff and Ravel Agree

When in this country a decade or more ago, the late Alexander Glazounoff was a guest in the box several times. On one occasion Koussevitzky played Maurice Ravel's Bolero, which was at that time all the rage. Glazounoff had never heard it. I asked him what he thought of it and he replied, "I think it is third-rate music, and wholly unworthy of so gifted a composer as Ravel."

This comment interested all the guests greatly, for it coincided with Ravel's own opinion of the work. The famous Frenchman sat in the box at one of the concerts during the season of 1928-9 and listened with great interest to Koussevitzky's reading his Suite, Ma Mère l'Ore. In voluble and rapid French, Ravel went into raptures over Koussevitzky's magnificent performance of the work. He was particularly impressed with the Boston Symphony. "We have nothing in France," he declared, "that can be compared with it."

In speaking of his Bolero, which all the orchestras were then playing, Ravel commented, "I consider it one of my least significant works, and its popularity is a great surprise to me and out of all proportion to its musical value."

Enter Thomas Mann, the Gishes and McCormack

Thomas Mann and his wife have been in the box at various times. He is quite musical and revealed an intelligent understanding of the classics in particular. He told me that he had studied the violin in his youth at Lübeck. On one occasion, in discussing Hitler, he said, "It is a mystery to me that a nation that has produced such giants as Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could be led astray by such a madman The Nazis have nothing in common with the men who made Germany a great nation."

Lillian and Dorothy Gish were with us several times some years ago. On one occasion John McCormack entered the loge, and on seeing them he enthusiastically exclaimed, "Sure, and it's a sight for sore eyes to look on the two of you!" During the pause he regaled us in his inimitable brogue with funny Irish anecdotes.

Some twelve years ago Ernst Toch's enormously difficult new Concerto for piano was being played by Jesús María Sanroma. Toch himself, with his charming wife, sat in the box with us. At the conclusion of the performance a French wit, who was present, exclaimed, "Grand Dieu! C'est un concerto du diable joué par Jésus!"

Serge Prokofieff was soloist with Koussevitzky at two concerts. He played his third and fifth piano concertos, and after the performance of these he sat in the box with us to hear the remainder of the program. His comments on standard classical works that Koussevitzky was performing were most amusing. Brahms, in particular, came in for his special condemnation. According to Prokofieff, nothing that Brahms ever wrote was worthy of being played in our day!

Some Stravinsky Mots

A different opinion of the third great German B was expressed by Prokofieff's illustrious compatriot, Igor Stravinsky, who has been with us in the box on several occasions in recent years. His admiration for Brahms is profound. When Mme. Koussevitzky told him that I had known Brahms, he was intensely interested and asked me many questions about the great composer.

At one of the concerts which Stravinsky attended, Sanroma was again soloist, performing that composer's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Stravinsky remarked, "I have done the Capriccio myself forty-two times in public with orchestra, but this is the first time I have ever heard another pianist play it." I said to him, "What a great difference there is in style and treatment between this and your earlier works, such as Oiseau de Feu, Petrushka and Sacre du Printemps."

"That is true," he replied, "but a quarter of a century has passed since I wrote them, and in those twenty-five years I have grown—I should hope."

Godowsky Defines Genius

A frequent and always welcome guest to the Koussevitzky box was the late Leopold Godowsky. As those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship well know, that great man was famous for his penetrating analyses of music and musicians, for his repartee, ready wit and epigrammatic comments. On one occasion I asked him how he distinguished between talent and genius.

Quickly he replied, "Talent is evolution, genius is revolution."

SICIAN—the one who gave birth to musical art, whose work and genius are responsible for this extraordinary prosperity and flowering of musical life—and who has brought the beauty and joy of music to the world? What has been the fate of the composer of the past? What is being done for the composer of our day?"

Dr. Koussevitzky builds up a strong case for the great composers of the past who lived and died in privation, poverty and obscurity. "Those Titans, who today are the pillars upholding the towering structure of musical art, were ignored by their contemporaries and allowed to die of heartbreak and misery. The monuments built in their honor, the deepening recognition of their immortality, will not erase the injustice allowed in their day." He continues to say that the present-day composer may not die of heartbreak and hunger but has to struggle along "to earn his living through other ways and sources than his God-given gift; as a composer he cannot make a living. He is forced to go out and teach, lecture, and crowd his day with trifling obligations which kill his time, his energies, his creative art. If his present-day life is less tragic it is none the less hard, unfair and maladjusted."

Dr. Koussevitzky declares that it is time to repay the debt of long standing which we owe the composer. He cites the example of Russia which "sensed the importance of art in this era of basic life reconstruction and offers every means of protection to her creative artist." He feels that this is the moment, while "America is fully conscious of the mission to restore the rights of men to protect the intellectual, creative and cultural forces from the deadly grip of Teutonic strangulation," to make an appeal on behalf of the composer in line with deep-rooted American tradition. "The appeal for the composer must embrace the whole musical world, reach the musician in every field, the music lover and sponsor, far and wide. It calls for the invaluable support of great music federations; for the joint cooperation of organizations and institutions vitally active in musical life; for the wide spread response of all those who derive enjoyment and inspiration from music.

"We musicians must be first to stand by the composer because we owe him most." Dr. Koussevitzky's plan is to ask a small annual donation of $1.00 from each performing musician which would bring in a substantial permanent income, with the joint cooperation and contribution of other groups and organizations, to form a composers' fund.

• • •

Roy Harris Receives Commission For Symphony

The first move in the direction to help the American composers as suggested by Dr. Koussevitzky was a commission from the National Broadcasting Company, announced by Mark Woods, President of the Blue Network, at a reception at the Waldorf-Astoria, May 17. Mr. Woods announced that he had commissioned Roy Harris to write a new symphony. He also made the statement that he made no demands on the composer, but hoped that the new work would be an expression of the nation's war effort. He said: "Since Roy Harris is essentially a man of the soil and one of our own, I hope his sixth symphony will be dedicated to the American fighting forces and that it will be a symbol of the struggle which our nation is making and has made throughout its eventful history for the freedom of mankind." Mr. Harris, in accepting the commission said that he would compose a "major moral symphony" that would deal with the Lincoln era which is as significant today as were the trying times of Lincoln's Presidency. Mr. Harris's Fifth Symphony was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union and was played by the Boston Symphony this winter. It was heard by short wave in Russia and a group of Soviet composers, including Prokofieff, Shostakovich and Miaskovsky, sent the American composer congratulations by cable.

• • •

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 4 - 1943

NEW BOSTON SERIES

As an innovation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs will be under the direction of a different conductor and will be performed in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, beginning July 18, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual Hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston Symphony will appear and such others as are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists will comprise Jesús María Sanromá, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and others.

The series opens July 18 and 19, with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky. It contains the Divertimenti in D (K. 251) and in E flat (K. 113); three arias with Mrs. Goldovsky as soloist; the "Haffner" symphony, and the piano concerto in G. The last named work will be played by Mr. Goldovsky and conducted by Mr. Burgin.

The second program, July 25-26, directed by Mr. Zighera, will consist of a Toccata, Bourrée and Giga by Domenico Scarlatti; Schubert's Fifth symphony; Stravinsky's "Pulchnella" suite; Ibert's "Capriccio" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte."

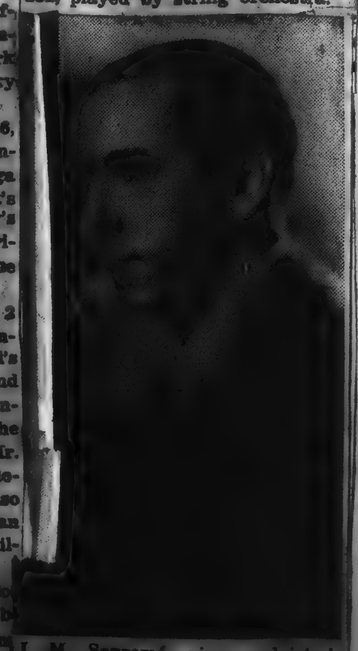
At the concerts of Aug. 1 and 2 the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments will be heard in Purcell's first and seventh "Fantasies," and works by Couperin, Gibbons, Handel and Gervaise. The rest of the offerings will be conducted by Mr. Bernstein, who will appear as soloist in Poulenc's "Aubade," and also will present "Three Mexican Dances" by Paul Bowles and Milhaud's "La Création du Monde."

Piston's "Three Pieces" for flute, clarinet and bassoon will be a feature of the fourth program Aug. 8-9, to be directed by Mr. Laurent, which lists further Jongen's "Rhapsody" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and piano; Mozart's quartet (K. 285) for flute, violin, viola and 'cello, and the Beethoven septet.

The fifth program, Aug. 15 and 16, under Mr. Woodworth's direction, will be composed of Bach's concerto in A minor for flute, violin, harpsichord and strings; Haydn's symphony No. 80, in F major, and Mozart's "Requiem Coeli," for chorus, soprano solo and orchestra.

On Aug. 22 and 28 Mr. Curtis will lead Handel's "Water Music"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Haydn's symphony in B flat, on a schedule also embracing Shostakovich's piano quintet, performed by Mr. Sanromá and the Burgin Quartet.

The final program, Aug. 29 and 30, conducted by Mr. Burgin, will be devoted to works for strings, including the Arensky "Variations"; Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," Volkmann's "Serenade" for 'cello and strings, and also Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 132, played by string orchestra.



J. M. Sanromá, piano soloist in Gershwin program Tuesday.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
JUN - - 1943

Aid For The American Composer

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has always championed the cause of the American composer. In the New York Times of May 16, he wrote a letter showing the phenomenal development of music as an art and a profession. He speaks of the development through music organizations, conservatories, orchestras and federations of music in this country. Artists "come to light, to glory, to wealth." He speaks of the rise to fame of orchestras, of the prosperity of radio, phonograph and publishing corporations, of the expansion of music federations which enlist hundreds of thousands of members. Music needs the performer. "It needs the ever widening realm and new vistas opened up by interpretative art. To be sure, the performing musician deserves the protection which his profession affords him; the artist-interpreter deserves recognition of the services he renders to the art of his election. BUT WHAT IS THE REWARD OF THE CREATIVE MU-

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
JUL 5 - 1943

Chamber Music Series Set

The opening concert in the annual "Midsummer Night" chamber music series will be held in the east rose garden of the Baltimore Museum of Art at 8.30 P. M. tomorrow. Concerts will be held each Tuesday at the same hour throughout the summer until August 24.

The program tomorrow includes the Mozart Piano Quartet in A Major, the Brahms String Quartet in A Minor, Opus 51, No. 2, and the Quintet in E Flat Minor, Opus 26, by Dohnanyi. Featured performers will be the Homewood Quartet, including Veda Reynolds, assistant to Efrem Zimbalist at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, first violin; Melvin Ritter, Peabody Conservatory scholarship student and member of the Baltimore Symphony, second violin; Alexander Fisham, of the National Symphony Orchestra, viola, and Mischa Niedeman, who will join the Boston Symphony next winter, cello. Richard Goodman, Baltimore musician, will be pianist.

The Baltimore Museum of Art will open its fifth annual Summer Sketch Club for children between the ages of 5 and 15 tomorrow morning. Classes will be held for white children on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and for colored children on Friday. They will last from 10 A. M. to noon and will be held through August 13.

Records Sought for Concerts at Fronts

An impromptu pops concert with phonograph records in a Nissen hut in far-off Dutch Harbor led last night to a movement to supply records for other such programs on all American fronts.

A letter from a New York Navy man to Arthur Fiedler, pops conductor, describing the sub-arctic program, inspired the idea at the Fort Devens night program of the Boston Pops concert in Symphony Hall. A WAAC detachment from Fort Devens was given the task of starting the collection of records.

867

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

JUL 4 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 11 1943

Boston Having New Summer Concert Series

Works in Small Forms Are To Be Performed by Chamber Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced a series of programs of music in the smaller forms. A double series of seven programs is planned, each program to be performed in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons at 4:30, beginning July 18, and each program to be repeated in New England Mutual Hall, Boston, on the following Monday evenings at 8:30, beginning July 19. All seats are offered by subscription at the nominal rate of $1.10 a concert, while the subscriber is given the option of taking five, six or seven programs pro rata according to his choice.

Each program will be under the direction of a different conductor, as follows: Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear and such others as are needed to comprise an orchestra of chamber proportions. Other soloists will be Jesús María Sanromá and Boris Goldovsky as pianists, members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano.

The program will be as follows:

July 18-19.

Boris Goldovsky, conductor.
Divertimento in D major, K. 251...Mozart
For two horns, oboe and strings.
Three Arias with Orchestra.....Mozart
Air from the cantata, "Der Schauspieldirektor."
Air from the cantata, "Die Seele des Weltalls."
Air from the cantata, "Davidde Penitente."
Soprano, Margaret Codd Goldovsky.
"Haffner" Serenade in D major, K. 250
.....Mozart
For violin solo, two flutes, two bassoons, two horns and strings.
Divertimento in E flat, K. 113.....Mozart
For two horns and strings.
Piano Concerto in G major, K. 453..Mozart
Soloist, Mr. Goldovsky.
(Richard Burgin conducting.)

July 25-26.

Bernard Zighera, conductor.
Toccata, Bouree, and Giga.....D. Scarlatti
Symphony No. 5 in B flat major..Schubert
Pavana pour une Infante defunte....Ravel
Capriccio .....Ibert
Pulcinella, Suite .....Stravinsky

Aug. 1-2

Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Leonard Bernstein, conductor.
La Sultan .....Couperin
For four viols and harpsichord.
First and Seventh Fantasies.....Purcell
Second Fantasie.....Orlando Gibbons
For four viols.
Sonata .....Handel
For viola da gamba and harpsichord.
Danceries .....Gervaise
For four viols and harpsichord.
Three Mexican Dances.....Bowles
Aubade .....Poulenc
Piano soloist, Leonard Bernstein.
La Creation du Monde.....Milhaud

Aug. 8-9.

Georges Laurent, conductor.
Rhapsody .....Jongen
For flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and piano.
Three Pieces .....Piston
For flute, clarinet and bassoon.
Quartet, K. 285.....Mozart
For flute, violin, viola, 'cello.
Septet, Op. 20.....Beethoven
For clarinet, horn, bassoon, violin, viola, violoncello, bass.

August 15-16

G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
Concerto in A minor.....Bach
For flute, violin, harpsichord and strings
Symphony No. 80 in D minor.....Haydn
Requiem Coeli .....Mozart
For chorus and soprano solo with Orchestra

August 22-23

Edgar Curtis, conductor
A Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Piano Quintet .....Shostakovitch
Jesus Maria Sanroma and the Burgin String Quartet
Symphony in B-flat.....Haydn
Water Music .....Handel

August 29-30

String Orchestra, Richard Burgin, conductor
Variations .....Arensky
Verklaerte .....Schoenberg
Serenade for 'Cello and Strings..Volkmann
Jean Bedetti, soloist
String Quartet in A minor, Op. 132
Beethoven

NEW BOSTON SERIES

NY Times July 4

AS an innovation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs will be under the direction of a different conductor and will be performed in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, beginning July 18, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual Hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston Symphony will appear and such others as are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists will comprise Jesús Maria Sanromá, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and others.

The series opens, July 18 and 19, with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky. It contains the Divertimenti in D (K. 251) and in E flat (K. 113); three arias with Mrs. Goldovsky as soloist; the "Haffner" symphony, and the piano concerto in G. The last named work will be played by Mr. Goldovsky and conducted by Mr. Burgin.

The second program, July 25-26, directed by Mr. Zighera, will consist of a Toccata, Bourrée and Giga by Domenico Scarlatti; Schubert's Fifth symphony; Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite; Ibert's "Capriccio" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte."

At the concerts of Aug. 1 and 2 the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments will be heard in Purcell's first and seventh "Fantasies," and works by Couperin, Gibbons, Handel and Gervaise. The rest of the offerings will be conducted by Mr. Bernstein, who will appear as soloist in Poulenc's "Aubade," and also will present "Three Mexican Dances" by Paul Bowles and Milhaud's "La Création du Monde."

Piston's "Three Pieces" for flute, clarinet and bassoon will be a feature of the fourth program, Aug. 8-9, to be directed by Mr Laurent, which lists further Jon gen's "Rhapsody" for flute, oboe clarinet, bassoon, horn and pian Mozart's quartet (K. 285) for flu violin, viola and 'cello, and t Beethoven septet.

The fifth program, Aug. 15 an 16, under Mr. Woodworth's direc tion, will be composed of Bach concerto in A minor for flute, vio lin, harpsichord and strings Haydn's symphony No. 80, in major, and Mozart's "Requie Coeli," for chorus, soprano sol and orchestra.

On Aug. 22 and 23 Mr. Curti will lead Handel's "Water Music" Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," an Haydn's symphony in B flat, on schedule also embracing Shostako vich's piano quintet, performed b Mr. Sanromá and the Burgin Quar tet.

The final program, Aug. 29 an 30, conducted by Mr. Burgin, wi be devoted to works for strings including the Arensky "Varia tions"; Schoenberg's "Verklaert Nacht," Volkmann's "Serenade for 'cello and strings, and also Beethoven's string quartet, Op 132, played by string orchestra.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

AUG 1 - 1943

World of Music

AS AN innovation, the Boston symphony orchestra is presenting a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs is under the direction of a different conductor and is performed in Sanders theater, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston symphony will appear and such others are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists comprise Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard glee club and Radcliffe Choral society and others.

The series opened July 18 and 19 with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky.

* * *

The American Ballad Singers, led by Elie Siegmeister, appeared recently in Oglebay park, Wheeling, W. Va., and in the starlight concerts at Meridian Hill park, Washington, D. C. The seven singers have covered 15,000 miles in 27 states in the last year. They sing native ballads from the time of the Pilgrim fathers down to Douglas MacArthur.

A half dozen folk songs from Virginia were added last year to the repertory, provided by people in the audiences. One was a ballad of the "fire and brimstone" type, called "The Drunkard and the Gambler," "who together in hell will sink." It makes a companion piece to the old favorite, "Rye Whisky," which proves that there still is joy in the mountains.

The Poor American Composer Again; Thoughts from All Over

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Every time I come into contact with that mentally "12-year-old public" they keep talking about, I am always amazed to discover that it seems to be able to keep the score for itself pretty well for all its mere 12 years. The latest case in point is the quality of the response to the Boston Pops series of radio quizzes or, to be specific, the answers to the question it propounded a fortnight ago: "Do you think that American composers should receive more consideration on the concert stage?"

It seems the directors of the Pops radio quiz got several thousand letters from all over the nation on that one, and awarded, I think, 100 prizes to those writers who expressed themselves most interestingly, regardless of their particular points of view. Naturally, the prize-winning letters reflected a rather higher level of thought than the others, but I have it straight from the judges that it was a long, arduous job to cull out the winners as virtually all the letters received were singularly pungent.

Be it as it may, the 100 prize winners had very definite ideas about American composers and American compositions. According to rough calculations, 50 per cent. of them stated unequivocably that American composers were not getting sufficient hearings, and all of that 50 per cent. were eager to hear anything an American cared to turn out, evidently just because he was American. Some, indeed, thought there ought to be a law forcing at least one native composition on every symphonic program. Ten per cent. were equally positive that American composers were entirely without merit, vastly over-rated and undeserving of any attention whatever. Some, indeed, thought there ought to be a law preventing the performance of American music. The remaining 40 per cent. took the middle road. And it is their opinions, carefully reinforced with observation of fact or reason, which seem most encouraging to me.

"I don't know why," says a Boston girl, "American composers should have any more consideration than anyone else." That particular theme, with thoughtful variations, runs through the whole 40 per cent. For instance, a Pennsylvanian says: "Since music is the only medium of international exchange which has not been debased, my interest in keeping tonal currency at par transcends the particular concern with the nationalistic tinge implied in the question. Whatever the merit of American-made composers (he goes on), and however much may be done for their welfare, there still remains the danger of fostering national prejudices, even parochialism, by any special indulgence for them. Music knows no frontiers. I am not afraid, moreover, that American composers, having something to say will be neglected or overlooked."

Others think American music should be played less frequently but with more discrimination; others point out that American music gets too much publicity and cannot measure up to expectation such publicity arouses. One says we're too rich, too fat and too young to produce good serious music; another says we're trying too hard to be "great" before we learn to be merely good; a third claims (and very justly, it seems to me) that American composers are embarrassed to write straightforward melodies because they're afraid their colleagues will consider them quaint or reminiscent, so they seek shelter behind enormously clever musical geometry. And a fourth points out that a deluge of forcibly-fed American music would entirely alienate audience sympathy because American music is music for musicians; the general public is neither an adequate nor an impartial judge, and to try to force the public to select the art from the effort would be a grave mistake.

The last world, however, is left to Gerald J. Morse of Washington, D. C., who says, in part, "We have now reached a comfortable ratio between new native works, new foreign creations and tried and proven classics. It might be argued we can never give sufficient opportunity to our creative artists; that it should not be left to a very few to limit what we, the greater number, are to hear. But, on the other hand, unlimited opportunities are going to subject the poor listener to an incredible amount of trash. Control the amount to be performed and you force greater discrimination upon the program planner. Much of the bad will thus be filtered out before it reaches us. Some of the good may also. But that is less of a calamity since those creations of value will at some future time be discovered and what we lose through impatience successive generations will gain anyway."

If Mr. Morse and the 39 others who contributed such enlightened comment represent 40 per cent. of the concert-going public (as it would seem they do), then it is clearly evident that the American composer need have no fear of not being heard and, heard, soundly evaluated. That 40 per cent. knows what it is talking about.

[87]

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JUL 10 1943

Pop Concert Background

Reprinted From a Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

IF YOU were able to make your way to a pop concert in Symphony Hall on any night of May or June, you will find a strange scene. The auditorium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears transformed in its summer decorations of green and gold. The stage, which holds some 90 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is banked in cut flowers. The floor of the auditorium is stripped of its formal rows of seats and in their place are tables about which waitresses are quietly busy.

The atmosphere is all strikingly different from that of winter concerts. One whispers to one's neighbor during the music without being frowned upon, or waves to a friend, or sips his Pop Punch. Smoking has become an aid to listening. Richard Wagner and Cole Porter are devoured with equal eagerness. Encores, which are against every winter tradition, are not only permitted — sometimes the encores are encored.

* * *

The pop concerts are unique to Boston and have been for the last 57 years. The concerts owe their origin to an experiment tried out as long ago as 1885 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old. At the end of the season a series of summer concerts was announced to be "made up largely of light music of the best class." It was on Saturday night, July 11, that began the "promenade concerts," so-called, with the seats removed from the old Music Hall in downtown Boston, tables installed and waiters in aprons much in evidence. The concerts were named after the age-old Promenade Concerts in London.

* * *

It is often asked whether the word "pop" originated in the word "popular" or in the sound of the wine bottles which sometimes unintentionally punctuate a pianissimo passage. The answer is that the origin is as old as the London concerts referred to by W. S. Gilbert in the jingles of "Patience":

Conceive me if you can—
An everyday young man,
A commonplace type
With a stick and a pipe
And a half-bred black and tan—

Who thinks suburban hops
More fun than Monday pops:
Who's fond of his dinner,
And doesn't get thinner
On bottled beer and chops.

Origin of Boston 'Pops'

Changes and fashions at the "Pops" through the years are an interesting barometer of our social past and present. The "Pops" owe their origin to an experiment which was tried as long ago as 1885, when the Boston Symphony orchestra was four years old. At the end of that season a series of summer concerts was announced, to be "made up largely of light music of the best class." The concerts were modeled after the Bilse concerts in Berlin, in a land where music and beer have always been associated.

It was on Saturday night, July 11, that there began the "Promenade Concerts," so-called, with the seats removed from the floor of the old Music hall in downtown Boston, tables installed and waiters in aprons much in evidence. The concerts were named after the age-old Promenade Concerts of London, the "Proms" which are still there when conditions permit, the hearers strolling about the cleared floor. The first Boston "Promenade Concert" of July 11 had an unmistakable "Pops" flavor, with the "William Tell" overture, Strauss's "Pizzicato Polka," and "Reminiscences from Tannhauser," but there are other numbers which have long since passed into oblivion — galops, marches, waltzes, even a selection called "An Evening With Bilse—Grand Quodlibet (or 'What Have You') representing the Programme of a Bilse concert in a condensed form."

The reviewer of the Boston Transcript refused to be astonished at beholding "light music and refreshments conjoined," although he had never seen the like at Music hall. He was reminded of the "Central Park Garden Concerts" of Theodore Thomas in New York, or the same conductor's "Summer Night Concerts" in Chicago, where, however, the tables were in the rear of the hall and the waiters made their appearance only in the intermission. He also compared it to the "Apollo Gardens" and other places in Boston—"places," he hastened to add, "frequented by respectable people is all that is intended here." This reviewer was further impressed by the "electric lamps"—the newest marvel of science.

The new-born Promenade Concerts had plentiful rivalry in entertainment, which hot weather did not seem to discourage. They had formidable rivalry at the Boston museum, where people were flocking to 'Polly, the Pet of the Regiment,' introducing the charming prima-donna, Miss Lillian Russell." There were also such stage pieces as the ever beloved "Count of Monte Cristo," with James O'Neill (father of Eugene), not to speak of minstrels, educated horses, and a wild west show. The Promenade Concerts outlasted all of these, as the newspapers kept repeating—

"These concerts will continue until further notice," and only on October 3 were they obliged to cease, to make way for another winter season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

This promising start was upheld in succeeding seasons as "Ad" Neuendorff, the first Pops conductor, was succeeded by Frank Kneisel (concert master of the orchestra and later founder of the Kneisel quartet), Timothee Adamowski, and Max Zach (later conductor at St Louis). Until 1900 the Pops were officially called "Promenade Concerts," but on the general tongue they must always have been "Pops"—in their very first week a march, "The Pops,' by Neuendorff, appears on the programs.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

grams of Music in Smaller Forms

The Boston symphony orchestra announces its first comprehensive venture in a series of programs of music in the smaller forms. Present conditions are such that all of the principals of the Boston symphony orchestra, and other players as needed, will be available for a summer series, while many music lovers will be within reach of the concerts this summer.

A double series of seven programs is announced, each program to be performed in Sanders theater, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons at 4.30, beginning the 18th and each program to be repeated in New England Mutual hall, Boston, on the following Monday evenings at 8.30, beginning the 19th. The two series will extend until August 29-30.

Each program will be under the direction of a different conductor. All of the principal players of the Boston symphony orchestra will appear and such others as are needed to comprise an orchestra of chamber proportions. Soloists will be Jesus Maria Sanroma and Boris Goldovsky as pianists, members of the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society and Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano.

The Boston symphony orchestra has for many years been the source from which many distinguished groups have been organized, from the days of the Kneisel quartet and the Longy club until the present. Now the orchestra is taking advantage of their admirable precedent to present music in its various smaller combinations.

All seats are offered by subscription at the nominal rate of $1.10 per concert, while the subscriber is given the options of taking five, six or seven programs pro rata according to his choice.

The programs will be as follows:—

July 18-19
Under the direction of Boris Goldovsky

Divertimento in D major, K. 251
For two horns, oboe and strings
Three Arias with orchestra
Air from "Der Schauspieldirektor"
Air from the Cantata "Dir, Seele des Weltalls"
Air from the Cantata "Davidde Penitente"
Soprano: Margaret Codd Goldovsky
"Haffner" serenade in D major, K. 250 Mozart
For violin solo, two flutes, two bassoons, two horns and strings
Divertimento in E-flat, K. 113
For two horns and strings
Piano concerto in G major, K. 453 .. Mozart
Soloist: Boris Goldovsky
(Richard Burgin conducting)

July 25-26
Under the direction of
Bernard Zighera

Toccata, Bourse and Giga .... D. Scarlatti
Symphony No 5 in E-flat major .. Schubert
Pavane pour une Infante defunte .... Ravel
Capriccio ..... Ibert
Pulcinella, suite ..... Stravinsky

August 1-2
Boston Society of Ancient Instruments

La Sultan ..... Couperin
For four viols and harpsichord
First and seventh fantasies ..... Purcell
Second fantasie ..... Orlando Gibbons
For four viols
Sonata ..... Handel
For viola da gamba and harpsichord
Danceries .. .. Gervaise
For four viols and harpsichord
Under the direction of Leonard Barnstein

Three Mexican dances ..... Bowles
Aubade ..... Poulene
Piano solo: Leonard Bernstein
La Creation du Monde ..... Milhaud

August 8-9
Under the direction of Georges Laurent

Rhapsody ..... Jongen
For flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and piano
Three pieces ..... Piston
For flute, clarinet and bassoon
Quartet, K. 285 ..... Mozart
For flute, violin, viola, cello
Septet, Op. 20 ..... Beethoven
For clarinet, horn, bassoon, violin, viola, violoncello, bass

August 15-16
Under the direction of
G. Wallace Woodworth

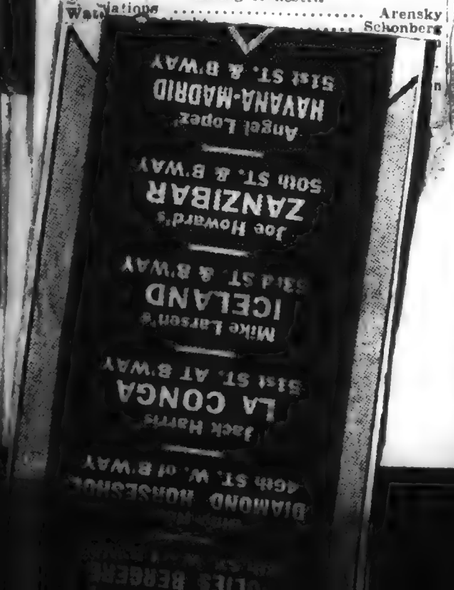
Concerto in A minor ..... Bach
For flute, violin, harpsichord and strings
Symphony No 80 in D minor ..... Haydn
Requiem Coeli ..... Mozart
For chorus and soprano solo with orchestra

August 22-23
Unde the direction of
Edgar Curtis

A Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
Piano quintet ..... Shostakovitch
Jesus Maria Sanroma and the Burgin string quartet
Symphony in B-flat ..... Hayn
Water music ..... Handel

August 29-30
Under the direction of
Richard Burgin
String orchestra

Variations ..... Arensky
..... Schonberg



NEW BOSTON SERIES

NY Times July 4

AS an innovation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs will be under the direction of a different conductor and will be performed in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, beginning July 18, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual Hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston Symphony will appear and such others as are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists will comprise Jesús Maria Sanromá, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and others.

The series opens, July 18 and 19, with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky. It contains the Divertimenti in D (K. 251) and in E flat (K. 113); three arias with Mrs. Goldovsky as soloist; the "Haffner" symphony, and the piano concerto in G. The last named work will be played by Mr. Goldovsky and conducted by Mr. Burgin.

The second program, July 25-26, directed by Mr. Zighera, will consist of a Toccata, Bourrée and Giga by Domenico Scarlatti; Schubert's Fifth symphony; Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite; Ibert's "Capriccio" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte."

At the concerts of Aug. 1 and 2 the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments will be heard in Purcell's first and seventh "Fantasies," and works by Couperin, Gibbons, Handel and Gervaise. The rest of the offerings will be conducted by Mr. Bernstein, who will appear as soloist in Poulenc's "Aubade," and also will present "Three Mexican Dances" by Paul Bowles and Milhaud's "La Création du Monde."

Piston's "Three Pieces" for flute, clarinet and bassoon will be a feature of the fourth program, Aug. 8-9, to be directed by Mr. Laurent, which lists further Jongen's "Rhapsody" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and piano; Mozart's quartet (K. 285) for flute, violin, viola and 'cello, and the Beethoven septet.

The fifth program, Aug. 15 and 16, under Mr. Woodworth's direction, will be composed of Bach's concerto in A minor for flute, violin, harpsichord and strings; Haydn's symphony No. 80, in F major, and Mozart's "Requiem Coeli," for chorus, soprano solo and orchestra.

On Aug. 22 and 23 Mr. Curtis will lead Handel's "Water Music"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Haydn's symphony in B flat, on a schedule also embracing Shostakovich's piano quintet, performed by Mr. Sanromá and the Burgin Quartet.

The final program, Aug. 29 and 30, conducted by Mr. Burgin, will be devoted to works for strings including the Arensky "Variations"; Schoenberg's "Verklaert Nacht," Volkmann's "Serenade" for 'cello and strings, and also Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 132, played by string orchestra.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS. JOURNAL
AUG 1 - 1943

World of Music

AS AN innovation, the Boston symphony orchestra is presenting a series of concerts this summer devoted to music for an ensemble of chamber proportions. Each of the seven programs is under the direction of a different conductor and is performed in Sanders theater, Cambridge, on successive Sunday afternoons, with repetition the next night in New England Mutual hall, Boston.

The conductors include Richard Burgin, Boris Goldovsky, Bernard Zighera, Georges Laurent, G. Wallace Woodworth, Edgar Curtis and Leonard Bernstein. All of the principal players of the Boston symphony will appear and such others as are needed. In addition to first desk men from the orchestra the soloists comprise Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boris Goldovsky and Mr. Bernstein, pianists; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; members of the Harvard glee club and Radcliffe Choral society and others.

The series opened July 18 and 19 with a Mozart program led by Mr. Goldovsky.

* * *

The American Ballad Singers, led by Elie Siegmeister, appeared recently in Oglebay park, Wheeling, W. Va., and in the starlight concert at Meridian Hill park, Washington, D. C. The seven singers have covered 15,000 miles in 27 states in the last year. They sing native ballads from the time of the Pilgrim fathers down to Douglas MacArthur.

A half dozen folk songs from Virginia were added last year to the repertory, provided by people in the audiences. One was a ballad of the "fire and brimstone" type, called "The Drunkard and the Gambler," "who together in hell will sink." It makes a companion piece to the old favorite, "Rye Whisky," which proves that there still is joy in the mountains.

The Poor American Composer Again; Thoughts from All Over

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Every time I come into contact with that mentally "12-year-old public" they keep talking about, I am always amazed to discover that it seems to be able to keep the score for itself pretty well for all its mere 12 years. The latest case in point is the quality of the response to the Boston Pops series of radio quizzes or, to be specific, the answers to the question it propounded a fortnight ago: "Do you think that American composers should receive more consideration on the concert stage?"

It seems the directors of the Pops radio quiz got several thousand letters from all over the nation on that one, and awarded, I think, 100 prizes to those writers who expressed themselves most interestingly, regardless of their particular points of view. Naturally, the prize-winning letters reflected a rather higher level of thought than the others, but I have it straight from the judges that it was a long, arduous job to cull out the winners as virtually all the letters received were singularly pungent.

Be it as it may, the 100 prize winners had very definite ideas about American composers and American compositions. According to rough calculations, 50 per cent. of them stated unequivocably that American composers were not getting sufficient hearings, and all of that 50 per cent. were eager to hear anything an American cared to turn out, evidently just because he was American. Some, indeed, thought there ought to be a law forcing at least one native composition on every symphonic program. Ten per cent. were equally positive that American composers were entirely without merit, vastly over-rated and undeserving of any attention whatever. Some, indeed, thought there ought to be a law preventing the performance of American music. The remaining 40 per cent. took the middle road. And it is their opinions, carefully reinforced with observation of fact or reason, which seem most encouraging to me.

"I don't know why," says a Boston girl, "American composers should have any more consideration than anyone else." That particular theme, with thoughtful variations, runs through the whole 40 per cent. For instance, a Pennsylvanian says: "Since music is the only medium of international exchange which has not been debased, my interest in keeping tonal currency at par transcends the particular concern with the nationalistic tinge implied in the question. Whatever the merit of American-made composers (he goes on), and however much may be done for their welfare, there still remains the danger of fostering national prejudices, even parochialism, by any special indulgence for them. Music knows no frontiers. I am not afraid, moreover, that American composers, having something to say will be neglected or overlooked."

Others think American music should be played less frequently but with more discrimination; others point out that American music gets too much publicity and cannot measure up to expectation such publicity arouses. One says we're too rich, too fat and too young to produce good serious music; another says we're trying too hard to be "great" before we learn to be merely good; a third claims (and very justly, it seems to me) that American composers are embarrassed to write straightforward melodies because they're afraid their colleagues will consider them quaint or reminiscent, so they seek shelter behind enormously clever musical geometry. And a fourth points out that a deluge of forcibly-fed American music would entirely alienate audience sympathy because American music is music for musicians; the general public is neither an adequate nor an impartial judge, and to try to force the public to select the art from the effort would be a grave mistake.

The last world, however, is left to Gerald J. Morse of Washington, D. C., who says, in part, "We have now reached a comfortable ratio between new native works, new foreign creations and tried and proven classics. It might be argued we can never give sufficient opportunity to our creative artists; that it should not be left to a very few to limit what we, the greater number, are to hear. But, on the other hand, unlimited opportunities are going to subject the poor listener to an incredible amount of trash. Control the amount to be performed and you force greater discrimination upon the program planner. Much of the bad will thus be filtered out before it reaches us. Some of the good may also. But that is less of a calamity since those creations of value will at some future time be discovered and what we lose through impatience successive generations will gain anyway."

If Mr. Morse and the 39 others who contributed such enlightened comment represent 40 per cent. of the concert-going public (as it would seem they do), then it is clearly evident that the American composer need have no fear of not being heard and, heard, soundly evaluated. That 40 per cent. knows what it is talking about.

[87]

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JUL 10 1943

Pop Concert Background

Printed From a Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

were able to make your ...o a pop concert in Sym... on any night of May ...u will find a strange ...e auditorium of the ...mphony Orchestra ap... ...nsformed in its summer ...ns of green and gold. ...e, which holds some 90 ... of the Boston Symphony ...ra, is banked in cut flow... ...e floor of the auditorium ...ped of its formal rows of ...nd in their place are tables ... which waitresses are quiet... ...sy.

...e atmosphere is all strik... ... different from that of win... ... concerts. One whispers to ...s neighbor during the music ...thout being frowned upon, or ...aves to a friend, or sips his Pop Punch. Smoking has become an aid to listening. Richard Wagner and Cole Porter are devoured with equal eagerness. Encores, which are against every winter tradition, are not only permitted — sometimes the encores are encored.

* * *

The pop concerts are unique to Boston and have been for the last 57 years. The concerts owe their origin to an experiment tried out as long ago as 1885 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old. At the end of the season a series of summer concerts was announced to be "made up largely of light music of the best class." It was on Saturday night, July 11, that began the "promenade concerts," so-called, with the seats removed from the old Music Hall in downtown Boston, tables installed and waiters in aprons much in evidence. The concerts were named after the age-old Promenade Concerts in London.

* * *

It is often asked whether the word "pop" originated in the word "popular" or in the sound of the wine bottles which sometimes unintentionally punctuate a pianissimo passage. The answer is that the origin is as old as the London concerts referred to by W. S. Gilbert in the jingles of "Patience":

Conceive me if you can—
An everyday young man,
A commonplace type
With a stick and a pipe
And a half-bred black and tan—

Who thinks suburban hops
More fun than Monday pops:
Who's fond of his dinner,
And doesn't get thinner
On bottled beer and chops.

Origin of Boston 'Pops'

Changes and fashions at the "Pops" through the years are an interesting barometer of our social past and present. The "Pops" owe their origin to an experiment which was tried as long ago as 1885, when the Boston Symphony orchestra was four years old. At the end of that season a series of summer concerts was announced, to be "made up largely of light music of the best class." The concerts were modeled after the Bilse concerts in Berlin, in a land where music and beer have always been associated.

It was on Saturday night, July 11, that there began the "Promenade Concerts," so-called, with the seats removed from the floor of the old Music hall in downtown Boston, tables installed and waiters in aprons much in evidence. The concerts were named after the age-old Promenade Concerts of London, the "Proms" which are still there when conditions permit, the hearers strolling about the cleared floor. The first Boston "Promenade Concert" of July 11 had an unmistakable "Pops" flavor, with the "William Tell" overture, Strauss's "Pizzicato Polka," and "Reminiscences from Tannhauser," but there are other numbers which have long since passed into oblivion — galops, marches, waltzes, even a selection called "An Evening With Bilse—Grand Quodlibet (or 'What Have You') representing the Programme of a Bilse concert in a condensed form."

The reviewer of the Boston Transcript refused to be astonished at beholding "light music and refreshments conjoined," although he had never seen the like at Music hall. He was reminded of the "Central Park Garden Concerts" of Theodore Thomas in New York, or the same conductor's "Summer Night Concerts" in Chicago, where, however, the tables were in the rear of the hall and the waiters made their appearance only in the intermission. He also compared it to the "Apollo Gardens" and other places in Boston—"places," he hastened to add, "frequented by respectable people is all that is intended here." This reviewer was further impressed by the "electric lamps"—the newest marvel of science.

The new-born Promenade Concerts had plentiful rivalry in entertainment, which hot weather did not seem to discourage. They had formidable rivalry at the Boston museum, where people were flocking to 'Polly, the Pet of the Regiment,' introducing the charming prima-donna, Miss Lillian Russell." There were also such stage pieces as the ever beloved "Count of Monte Cristo," with James O'Neill (father of Eugene), not to speak of minstrels, educated horses, and a wild west show. The Promenade Concerts outlasted all of these, as the newspapers kept repeating—

"These concerts will continue until further notice," and only on October 3 were they obliged to cease, to make way for another winter season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

This promising start was upheld in succeeding seasons as "Ad" Neuendorff, the first Pops conductor, was succeeded by Frank Kneisel (concert master of the orchestra and later founder of the Kneisel quartet), Timothee Adamowski, and Max Zach (later conductor at St Louis). Until 1900 the Pops were officially called "Promenade Concerts," but on the general tongue they must always have been "Pops"—in their very first week a march, "The Pops,' 'by Neuendorff, appears on the programs.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JUL 8- 1943

LONGHAIRS PULL AIR DOUGH

WALTER WINCHELL

(Copyright, 1943, Daily Mirror)

Typewriter Sonata for Two Fingers:

TSCHAIKOWSKY LIVED with his wife less than a month. She got on his nerves so much he had a collapse and stayed unconscious for 48 hours . . . He never spoke to the next woman in his life . . . Conducted all relations with her via letter, and she paid him $6,000 a year pension. (See what happens when you practice?) . . . Berlioz's famous "Symphonic Fantastique" was an early torch tune written because an Irish actress gave the composer the brusheroo . . . Schubert, because of his fondness of the grape, was affectionately nicknamed "The Little Sponge" . . . When Spohr introduced the baton in England in 1820 he created a terrific dither. Saronoff, on the other hand, upset the New York music world in 1904 by conducting without one . . . Florenz Ziegfeld, Sr., founded the Chicago Musical College and was its head for almost 50 years. His son then glorified American girls . . . Before the quality of his voice was discovered Caruso was a blacksmith.

* * * * *

Smetena, the great Czech composer, wrote many of his most successful works after he had become stone deaf . . . Jose Iturbi, when he plays the piano, uses a seat not much higher than a footstool . . . There are more than 300 symphony orchestras in the United States. Ten years ago there were less than 100 . . . The Boston Symphony costs about $500,000 a year . . . Hitler's musical hero, Wagner, harangued his visitors in a conceited monolog, just like Adolf . . . Stokowski's mother was Irish . . . Marian Anderson seldom sings love lilts . . . The first broadcast of opera was in 1910 when Lee De Forest air-waved performances of "Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Caruso thrushing from the stage of the Met . . . One of the earliest "Symphonies" was played on three flutes . . . Toscanini, on his way to Radio City, often pauses at a near-by church to pray before a performance.

* * *

VERDI WAS a grocer's clerk and played the pianner with the boss' daughter. He married her . . . Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Phila Symphony Orchestra, used to conduct the crew at Broadway's Capitol movie theater . . . Intimates would have you believe that Stokowski's erect posture is due to his Yogi exercises . . . Rachmaninoff almost always was accompanied by an electric heating pad for his hands . . . Donald Voorhees, Dr. Frank Black and Howard Barlow are the best-known American-born conductors . . . Voorhees comes from old colonial stock. The town of Guthsville, Pa., was named after his mother's folks . . . Olin Downes used to be a reporter on the Boston Post . . . Wagner created a sensation in Russia when he faced his men instead of the audience, while conducting.

* * *

Mme. Schumann-Heink wept after the first act of her operatic debut at the Metropolitan Opera House because she thought the shouts and whistling by the audience were catcalls instead of acclaim . . . Ravel wrote his famed "Bolero" for Ida Rubenstein, the dancer, as a ballet . . . For a long time it was thought the thumb should never touch the black keys of a piano, and Scarletti created a sensation when he introduced the crossing of the hands while playing the piano . . . Paganini, generally regarded as the greatest violin virtuoso of all time, was such a confirmed gambler, he once pawned his fiddle, his sole means of livelihood, to meet a gambling debt. He wound up owning a piece of a gambling joint.

KAUNEONGA LAKE, N.Y.
TIMES
6/11/43

Five Low Notes Added To Play New Symphony

BOSTON.—The bass clarinet has hit a new note with the Boston Symphony orchestra. For its first performance of the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony the Boston orchestra introduced the new instrument, which has five new low notes below the usual final bass. The instrument's lowest tone is equivalent to the lowest A-flat on a piano. Rosario Mezzeo, bass clarinetist of the orchestra, spent several months perfecting the instrument to get the exact effect wanted by the com-

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JUL 14 1943

Would Invite Top Russe Composers to America

Serge Koussevitsky has accepted the chairmanship of a committee of outstanding industry names which will attempt to bring outstanding Russian composers and entertainers to this country for a concert to take place next Nov. 8 at Madison Square Garden, N. Y. This affair, sponsored by the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship, will be a discussion and demonstration of contemporary music by outstanding names in the field.

An attempt is being made to get Shostakovich, Prokofieff and numerous other Russian luminaries here for the affair.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe July 11, 1943

Music in the Smaller Forms

Boston and Cambridge will not be lacking in music of the first importance through the Summer. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced a series of seven pairs of concerts of music in the smaller forms, each program to be presented in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Sunday afternoons at 4:30 and New England Mutual Hall on the following Monday evenings at 8:30. Each program will be in charge of a different director already prominent in this field. Putnam Aldrich will be the harpsichordist.

For the first program (July 18-19), Boris Goldovsky as conductor announces music of Mozart, including movements from the Divertimento (K. 251); Three Arias with Orchestra, Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, as soloist; three movements from the "Haffner" Serenade, Richard Burgin as soloist; and the G major Piano Concerto (K. 453), Mr. Goldovsky as soloist and Mr. Burgin conducting.

The second program (July 25-26) will be conducted by Bernard Zighera and will consist of a Suite by Scarlatti-Casella, Schubert's Fifth Symphony, Ravel's Pavane, Ibert's Capriccio, and Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite.

The third program (Aug. 1-2) will consist of numbers by the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, with music for a quartet of viols under the supervision of Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba. The second part of this program will be under the direction of Leonard Bernstein and will consist of Three Mexican Dances by Bowles, Poulenc's Aubade, with piano solo by Mr. Bernstein, and Milhaud's "Creation of the World."

The fourth program (Aug. 8-9) will be under the supervision of Georges Laurent and will consist of chamber music, as follows: Roussel's Serenade, Three Pieces by Piston for woodwind trio, Mozart's Quartet for flute and strings (K. 285), and Beethoven's Septet, Op. 20.

The fifth program (Aug. 15-16) will be under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth, and in the second part the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe will be heard in Mozart's "Regina Coeli." The first part of the program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and Prelude to Cantata No. 21; also Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Haydn's Symphony No. 80.

The sixth program (Aug. 22-23) will be under the direction of Edgar Curtis, who will conduct Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," Haydn's recently published Symphony in B-flat major, and Handel's "Water Music." Jesus Maria Sanroma and the Burgin String Quartet will present the Fifth Piano Quintet of Shostakovitch.

The seventh program (Aug. 29-30) will be for string orchestra, under the direction of Richard Burgin, and will consist of Arensky's Variations, Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht," Volkmann's Serenade for 'Cello and Strings, with Jean Bedetti, and Beethoven's String Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, played by the String Orchestra.

Closing Week of the Pops

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, will bring to an end their 58th season next Saturday night.

Tonight, Eugene Plotnikoff, the Russian conductor, making his first appearance as guest at the Pops, will present an all-Russian program. There will be no concert Monday, but on Tuesday there will be one more Old Timers' Night, to be conducted by Carlos Pinfield.

On Wednesday, Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in Tchaikovsky's familiar Concerto; and on Thursday the soloist will be the pianist Helen Zoe Duncan, in a Concerto by Hummel, contemporary of Beethoven. On Friday, Selma Kramer, the pianist well-remembered from past seasons, will return to appear in Schumann's Concerto. The programs of the week follow:

TONIGHT at 8:15. Eugene Plotnikoff conducting. Overture, "The Russian Easter," Rimsky-Korsakov; Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, Tchaikovsky; Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakov; Concert Waltz in D major, Glazounov; Polovetzian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

TUESDAY at 8:13, Old Timers' Night. Carlos Pinfield conducting. "King Cotton," March, Sousa; Carneval Overture, Dvorak; "Southern Roses," Waltzes, Strauss; Old Timers' Night at the Pops, Arranged by Lake; "The Merry Widow," Selection, Lehar; "The Soul of the Surf," Clay Smith, trombone soloist. John Coffey; Song Fest, Medley; Victor Herbert Favorites, Arranged by Sanford; Turkey in the Straw; "America Sings," Guion.

WEDNESDAY at 8:15 — March, "Lorraine," Ganne; "Danse Macabre," Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens; "Little," Fugue in G minor, Bach-Cailliot; Polka and Russian Dance from "The Golden Age," Shostakovich; Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23, Tchaikovsky, soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes, Strauss; "As Time Goes By," from "Casablanca," Hupfeld-Bodge; Salute to Our Fighting Forces, arranged by Bodge.

THURSDAY at 8:15 — Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; Overture to "Raymond," Thomas; Hora Staccato, Dinicu-Heifetz; "Carmen," Fantasia, Bizet; Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 85, Hummel, soloist, Helen Zoe Duncan; Bolero, Ravel; "The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasy, Saint-Saens, pianos, Jesus Maria Sanroma-Leo Litwin; Salute to Our Fighting Forces, arranged by Bodge.

FRIDAY, at 8:15, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Third Movement, Scherzo, from the "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven; Waltz Scene from "Faust," Gounod; Piano Concerto in A Minor, Schumann, soloist, Selma Kramer; "Voices of Spring," Waltzes, Strauss; "Brazil," Samba from "Saludas Amigos," Barroso-Gould; Salute to Our Fighting Forces, arranged by Bodge.

SATURDAY, at 8:15, Closing Night. "Washington Post," March, Sousa; Ballet Suite from "Faust," Gounod; "Hoe Down," from the Ballet "Rodeo," Copland; "The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasy, Saint-Saans, Pianos, Jesus Maria Sanroma-Leo Litwin; Salute to our Fighting Forces, arranged by Bodge; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Austrian Peasant Dances, Schonherr; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn, Valerius; "Stars and Stripes Forever," March, Sousa.

Servicemen's Concert

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

JUL 10 1943

CBS Sets Philly Ork; Blue Snags Boston Symph Sponsor; NBC Lands General Motors

Only Mutual Is Fiddler's Stepchild

NEW YORK, July 3.—Announcement will be made within the next four weeks that both the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra have snagged sponsors. Neither of these longhair organizations has announced sponsorship but The Billboard has learned that both have been sold, altho the formal signatures haven't yet been inked.

The Mutual Broadcasting System, unable to sell the Stokowski-built organization which it featured for the past few years, lost it this week to Columbia Broadcasting System. CBS signed a three-year contract for the exclusive Philly broadcasts. Philadelphia org, under direction of Eugene Ormandy, will be presented Coast-to-Coast over CBS starting October 2, from 1 to 2 p.m.

Broadcasts will be sponsored by an automotive manufacturer, who will take over the commercial end of the concert presentations in January, 1944, and will continue bank-rolling the broadcasts to April 30, the period covered by the CBS contract. It is known that the sponsor has clause in the yet-to-be-signed contract giving him the right to extend the broadcasts on a year-round basis. Problem involves clearing other time for April to October sessions or shifting of Philly sessions to a different time for the 52 weeks. Sponsor no like Saturday time when the sun is high.

Having a sponsor ready to sign on the dotted line is what enabled CBS to take the Philadelphia longhairs away from Mutual, for MBS was ready to raise the ante on the sustaining shows and even open up an evening spot for them. However, the difference between the sustaining and commercial coin is such that no matter how grateful the Philadelphia underwriters were, they couldn't hold their key musicians without visions of commercial broadcasting jack.

Since the deal also carried with it a sizable recording contract on an if, and when basis, which Mutual couldn't pretend to deliver, Mutual was licked before it started.

Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitsky has been a major Blue Net headache since it was signed. Every known pitch has been made to the Ford organization, but Edsel Ford was convinced that when Ford decided once again to use a symphony he would return to the Detroit Symphony, which he had sponsored under the commercial name of the Ford Symphony. With Edsel's death the Blue renewed its pitch and now all but has the Henry Ford signature set for this fall. Present rub is that Serge must agree to come to Detroit and conduct local symph. Wealthy Mrs. Serge objects to this part of the Ford deal, but there is every indication that she will give in in order to hold the Boston group intact, which only the broadcasting can do.

With the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony about to be sold, the NBC symphony officially signatured this past week for sponsorship by General Motors (first broadcast scheduled August 1) and the New York Philharmonic, bank-rolled since May by the U. S. Rubber Company, network scramble will start for the big "lesser symphonic groups"—St. Louis, Los Angeles, Cleveland and Detroit.

Sponsors are longhaired-minded because they no longer are interested in "selling commercials" and big name orchestras lend prestige. The wives love it.

Networks are not exactly annoyed by the longhair trend because it enables them to turn a profit with programs that have been carried in the past as public service, NBC symphony for instance, cost the senior RCA network over a half-million dollars each year, without free time being included in the figure, and the Philharmonic stuck a sizable finger in the CBS kitty.

As long as advertisers have nothing to sell, the longhairs will be in the dough.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

ROY HARRIS has resigned as composer-in-residence at Cornell University to accept a fellowship at Colorado College, Colorado. While at Cornell, Harris composed several works, including his fifth symphony, which was given its first performance last February by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky.

He is now working on his sixth symphony, which will have a choral accompaniment. It is based on a critical period of the Lincoln era. It also will be given its first performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, to be heard over the Blue Network next April.

* * *

Boston Traveler
Enterprise
JUL 23 1943

Stand in Rain for National Anthem

BOSTON, July 23.—(UP)—Nearly 14,000 persons, attending a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on the Charles River Esplanade, halted their mad flight from a sudden electrical storm last night to stand in the driving rain while the orchestra finished playing "The Star-Spangled Banner."

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
JUL 18 1943

Symphony Concerts May Mean Millions to Nets and Stations

IT is possible that before long radio will be deriving a revenue of four million dollars a year or more from sponsored symphony orchestra broadcasts.

The contract for sponsorship of the NBC Symphony Orchestra broadcasts on the NBC net, including KSD, Sunday afternoons for a year after Aug. 1 involves about $785,000 for time on the stations thus far agreeing to carry the series, and for musicians' and conductors' salaries. The Sunday New York Philharmonic Orchestra concerts, which are carried on 117 CBS net stations, cost nearly $20,000 a week for time and close to $10,000 a week for musicians and soloists, or a total of around $1,500,000 a year.

The CBS net, which has a three-year contract with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, effective Oct. 2, expects to get about $8000 a week for time and $10,000 a week for musicians, conductor and soloists when it finds a sponsor for the series by this orchestra planned for 12 noon to 1 o'clock Saturdays.

The Blue net is offering for sale its Boston Symphony Orchestra series now scheduled Saturday nights. Cost of these concerts to a sponsor would be about the same as that of the Philadelphia Orchestra series on the CBS net.

ANTHEM HALTS RUSH OF CROWD

Stampede of 14,000 on Esplanade as Storm Breaks Turns to a Patriotic Demonstration

WHEN THE RAIN FELL

Newspapers became improvised rain shields at the Esplanade last night when rain suddenly descended on the thousands assembled for the opening of the summer night concerts.

Surging patriotism prevented a stampede of 14,000 persons last night at the opening of the 15th season of the Esplanade concerts. Sudden drenching showers and an electric storm burst without warning on the banks of the Charles River. Concert fans started a blind, pell-mell dash to escape the deluge as if an air raid alarm had been sounded, but in a moment they were stopped in their tracks by the playing of the National Anthem.

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH
JUL 19 1943

Every Member A Soloist

By TOM CHASE

Boston, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire Festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire Festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

MUSIC

SANDERS THEATRE

Symphony Chamber Concert

It was hot as blazes yesterday, but a sizable audience arrived at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, for the first concert of seven pairs to be given by first-desk men and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This initial program was devoted to Mozart and it was conducted by Boris Goldovsky who, though not a member of the Boston Symphony, is a prominent figure in Boston music. It was also the occasion of the first public appearance here of the conductor's wife, soprano Margaret Codd Goldovsky.

First came the D major Divertimento (K. 251), which is longish Mozart, and after awhile came the "Haffner" Serenade (K. 250), which is better Mozart. Richard Burgin was a superb violin soloist for the Serenade, as well as an excellent conductor of the G major Piano Concerto (K. 453) in which Mr. Goldovsky relinquished the conductor's stand for the keyboard.

In geenral the playing was the sort to come from Boston Symphony men, although a horn burbled in the Serenade, and there were ragged attacks and entrances by other instruments. These last may, I think, be attributed to Mr. Goldovsky's wide and showy gestures, which seemed to upset the orchestra.

As pianist, however, Mr. Goldovsky was at the top of his form, playing fluently and gracefully, with great refinement of style and phrasing, and he decidedly relished the witty last movement.

Mrs. Goldovsky contributed an aria each from "Der Schauspieldirektor" and the cantatas, "Dir, Seele des Weltalls" and "Davidde Penitente.' She has a small, lyric soprano of not much distinction or color, and she attacked high notes explosively. The external correctness of her phrasing, style and floriture suggested careful teaching, but I felt in her singing little warmth or spontaneity.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30 in New England Mutual Hall, Boston.—C. W. D.

MUSIC-LOVERS SCAMPER from Esplanade when rain ruined the first concert—and some dresses.

First Open-Air Concert on Esplanade Rained Out

Arthur Fiedler's luck with the weather suffered a temporary reverse last evening, and the first Esplanade Concert of the season was rained out.

All went well through the first half of the program and the intermission speeches by Gov. Saltonstall and Metropolitan District Commissioner Eugene C. Hultman. Then the thunderheads which had been massing across the Charles River began to move. Just as Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra launched into "The Star Spangled Banner," the rain let go.

Here was an example in psychology. Many in the crowd, which police estimated at 14,000, began to run, some of the less hardy souls had already departed before a drop fell. But a large segment of the audience remained, some under the umbrellas which New England caution had advised them to bring, and heard to its conclusion the anthem of their country.

Esplanade Concert Spoiled by Rain

Continued from the First Page

Rain on an opening night has been rare since Arthur Fiedler founded these concerts in 1929. His remarkable series has suffered occasionally but on the whole the "Fiedler luck" has been exceptionally good.

In the early days of the Esplanade concerts it was found that now and then a musician would fail to turn up at the shell because it was raining where he lived. So a rule was made that the entire orchestra must appear for every program—unless the weather were so bad that advance cancellation seemed reasonable. As long as there were some people to listen, and the instruments did not get wet, Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra of Boston Symphony men would continue to play.

After the clearing which followed yesterday morning's downpour it had seemed that there would be a good night for the opening of the 15th Esplanade season. Those who arrived early and settled down in rented camp chairs found the air humid, the sky cloudy and a fair wisp of breeze from the southwest.

Then the gray sky became grayer, lightning shot through distant clouds and the slow thunder quickened until, in the "Marche Slave," its rumbling fitted in with the drums and basses of Tchaikovsky's popular opus.

This is the second wartime year of Boston's unique Summer music. More men and women in uniform than ever before will doubtless be seen among the audiences. In accordance with the dimout regulations, Esplanade concerts now begin at 7:30 instead of 8:30 and finish at 9 instead of 10.

In past years there were no concerts on Saturday evenings. With commendable thought for the servicemen and women who will be spending weekend furloughs in Boston, Mr. Fiedler has decided, this year, to omit Monday concerts. On all other evenings between now and Aug. 18, there will be music at the Edward Hatch Memorial on the Esplanade near the foot of Mt. Vernon st.

As Gov. Saltonstall said, the Esplanade concerts were begun in the year of peak prosperity; they continued through the depression, and they are now carrying on in times of war. These concerts, he emphasized, are needed because music is relaxation, and in wartime we need relaxation from work. He congratulated Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra for past achievements and bade them continue into the future. After his brief address the Governor bought a $1000 War Bond.

Gov. Saltonstall was introduced by Commissioner Hultman. Through the cooperation of the First Service Command and the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety, added Commissioner Hultman, all precautions have been taken to provide for the safety of Esplanade audiences.

Will Feature Talks

Up to the breaking of the storm, the crowd heard Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 1; the first movement from Beethoven's Fifth (or "V for Victory") Symphony; the "Little" G minor Organ Fugue of Bach as transcribed for orchestra by Lucien Cailliet, and the aforementioned "Marche Slave," together with several encores.

What effect the ban on pleasure driving will have on the size of Esplanade audiences must remain to be seen. It is true that in other years many persons came in from out of town. Usually opening nights have attracted more than 14,000 but the threatening weather may have accounted significantly for the drop this year.

Again there are to be talks preceding some of the concerts, notably on Tuesdays and Fridays, when the work of composers whose names appear on the Hatch Memorial will provide most of the topics. Tonight John N. Burk, annotator of the Boston Symphony program books and author of a new biography of Beethoven, will talk about that composer.

The principal speaker of the series, Mrs. Dorothy Tremble Moyer, will discuss "Entertainment in Music from the Troubadours to 'Peter and the Wolf,'" July 30, and next Tuesday Cyrus W. Durgin, music and drama critic of the Boston Globe, will review the 15 years of Esplanade history.

Among the listeners last evening were Jerome D. Greene and Henry B. Sawyer, respectively, president and vice president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler said to newspapermen, during the intermission, that he will receive at the Hatch Memorial recordings of music to be forwarded to Mrs. Charles H. Lee of the Citizens' Committee for Soldiers and Sailors. These recordings will then be donated to military and naval stations for the entertainment of personnel. Many records have already been distributed by the committee and their supply has become exhausted.—C. W. D.

MOZART CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A new series of concerts by the principals and other players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by other groups, by various soloists and enlisting the services of a half-dozen conductors, had an auspicious beginning at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, yesterday afternoon. The all-Mozart programme, conducted by Boris Goldovsky and (in one number) by Richard Burgin, will be repeated at Boston's New England Mutual Hall this evening. In all there will be seven pairs of these concerts devoted to works suitable for chamber orchestra, to chamber music and compositions for chorus.

To put it alliteratively, too much minor Mozart may make for monotony and that factor was not altogether absent yesterday. On the other hand there was much that was rewarding and much that had the interest of novelty, since one aim of this war-born summer series is to present music, old and new, that lies off the beaten track. After the first number, the only moderately engrossing Divertimento in D major (K. 251), Margaret Codd Goldovsky, in private life Mrs. Boris Goldovsky, made her local debut in three little known arias. Two of these were from cantatas and one from the little opera "Der Schauspielddirektor," or as it is sometimes called, "The Impressario." This last, of brilliant character, was familiar Mozart, but one could detect an unaccustomed voice in the excerpts from "Dir, Selle des Weltalls" and "Davidde Penitente." Mrs. Goldovsky sang these numbers competently, even expertly, but with a tone that verged on the metallic.

The one conventional item of the afternoon, three movements from the "Haffner" Serenade, featured Mr. Burgin as the violin soloist, required by the score, and, considering the difficulties of playing a stringed instrument on so hot and sticky an afternoon, he acquitted himself well. In what was said to be the first performance hereabouts of the Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453), Mr. Goldovsky and Mr. Burgin exchanged roles. Though much of interest and value had gone before, this concerto furnished the true climax of the concert. Why a piece of such poetry and beauty, with such dramatic fire and such originality of harmony and instrumentation, should be neglected is another of the many mysteries of the concert-room. Mr. Goldovsky, who had already proved himself an accomplished conductor, again disclosed himself as a delightful pianist. The excellent playing of the small orchestra may be taken for granted. An audience, which by no means filled the hall, plainly enjoyed itself in spite of the heat, a considerable tribute to music and performance.

MIDDLETOWN, PA.
JOURNAL
7/16/43

Check-Up Reveals Kind Of Music Soldiers Like

NEW YORK.—Here's a consensus of records which prominent artists, including Lawrence Tibbett, John Charles Thomas, Gladys Swarthout, Jeanette MacDonald, were asked for while making nation-wide tours of army and navy bases.

The selections (albums); (1) Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1, by the Philadelphia Orchestra; (2) Stephen Foster music, sung by Richard Crooks; (3) Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, by Sanroma and Boston "Pops" Orchestra; (4) Strauss Waltzes, by Boston "Pops" Orchestra; (5) Dance album by Artie Shaw's orchestra.

Single selections: (1) The Lord's Prayer, by Gladys Swarthout and by John Charles Thomas; (2) Intermezzo, played by Toscha Seidel; (3) Gounod's Ave Maria, by Jeanette MacDonald, Schubert's Ave Marie by Marian Anderson; (4) Donkey Serenade and Giannina Mia, by Allan Jones; (5) Andante Cantabile and Humoresque, by Fritz Kreisler.

[89]

Jul 19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra

From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486) "Bester Jungling"

From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir di Freude"

From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

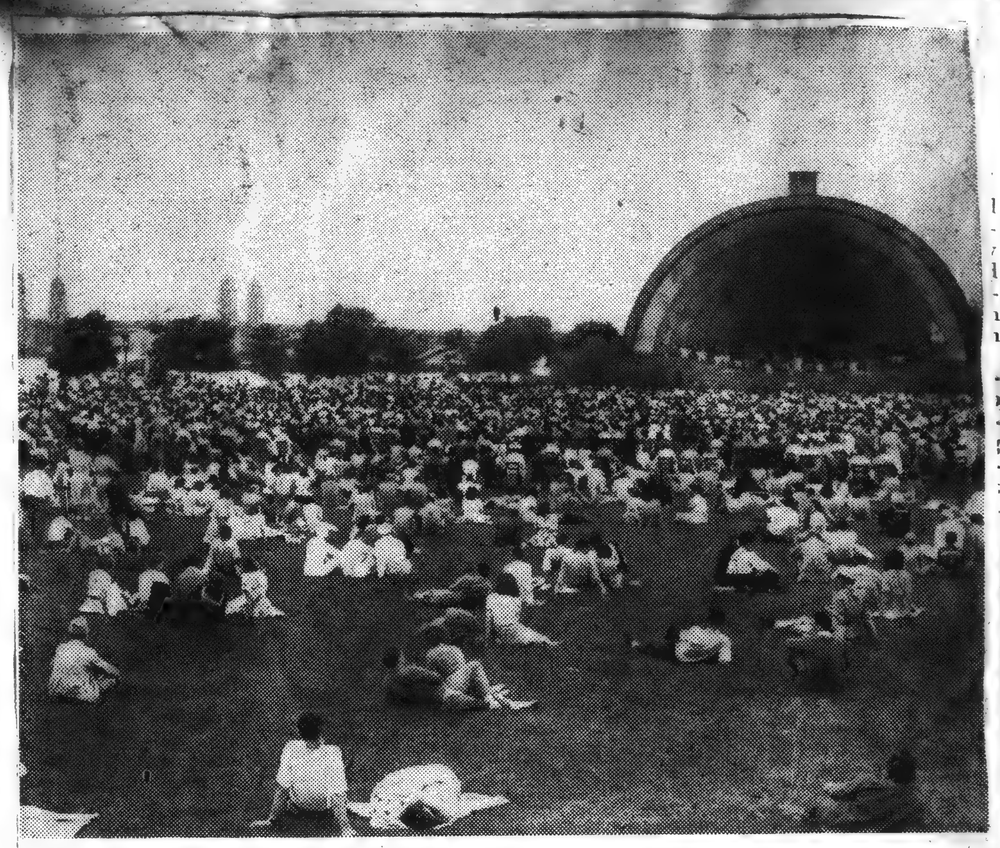
The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

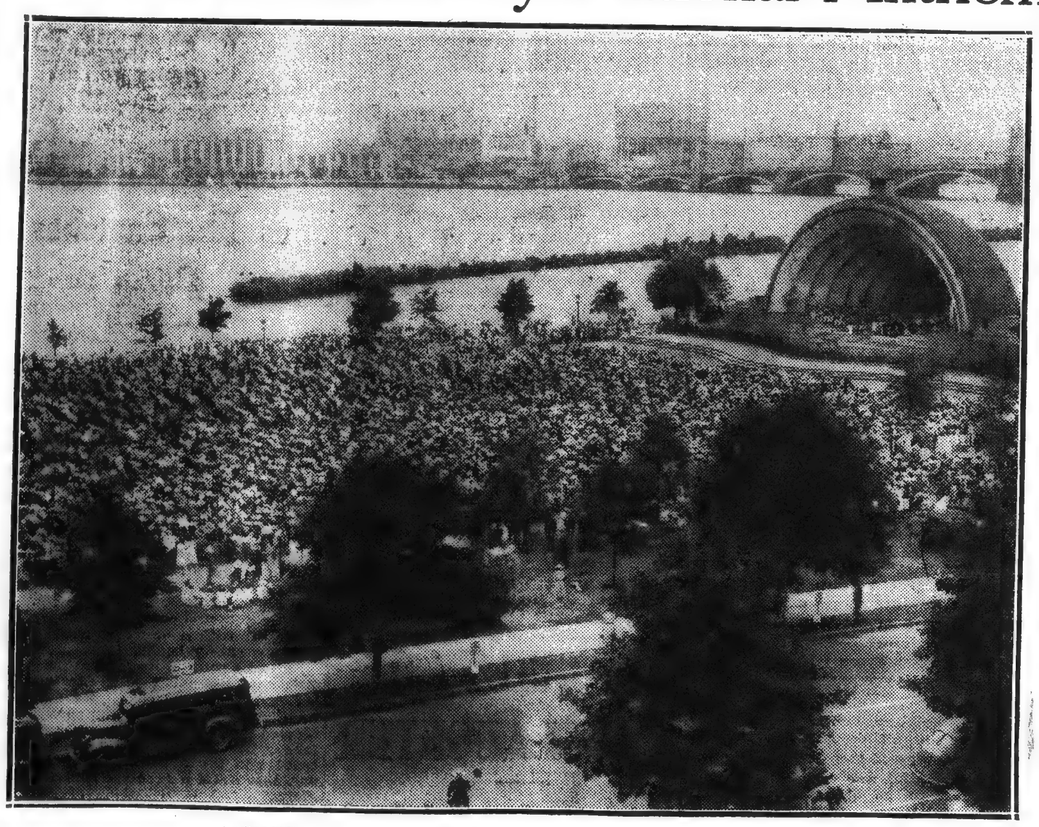
Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.



PENING NIGHT AT THE ESPLANADE last night as the Esplanade concerts began thei 5th season. Threatening weather was blamed for the attendance being lower than o pening nights of other years. The concerts will be from 7:30 to 9 this year, every nigh xcept Monday.

Stampede of 14,000 at Esplanade Concert Halted by National Anthem



ANTHEM HALTS STAMPEDE OF ESPLANADE 14,000

When rain fell at last night's opening of summer night concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, the crowd o 14,000 persons started to stampede. But the orchestra struck up the "Star Spangled Banner" and the grea throng halted and sang the anthem through to the end.

BOX OFFICE
KANSAS CITY, MO.

JUN 19 1943

Koussevitzky Sponsors Plan For American Composers

BOSTON—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has a plan to make American composers imperishable and to support those who need such support while they are struggling for recognition. It will interest everyone in the theatrical world, for Koussevitzky is of sufficient importance to have his opinions deeply interest all.

Koussevitzky terms his plan "Justice to Composers" and he is going into it heart and soul to actually interest musicians, music lovers and theatre men the world over.

He believes that American composers, in particular, lack recognition. He proposes that a fund be created to promote and encourage composers throughout the world and to see that their works are given a thorough and impartial hearing on every side by experts and in turn tried out by orchestras.

Koussevitzky hopes to be able to interest the high officials of the amusement and music world.

Continued From First Page

As the first of the rain descended through the zig-zagging of the lightning, Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, struck up with the stirring notes of the "Star Spangled Banner." Almost without a single exception, men, women and children came to a halt. They remained standing in the driving storm, their voices raised in the familiar words of freedom. By the time the last note was sounded, they had recovered from their panicky reaction, even though the squall was at its height.

Girls in pretty summer clothes, ribbons, flowers, gay-printed dresses and colored open-toed shoes that had cost many a coupon tried to protect their precious finery with newspapers and their escorts' coats.

Governor Saltonstall was among those caught in the rain. After making his speech, in which he referred to "this beautiful evening in which a free people can listen to the music and watch the sailboats in the river," the skies on the farther side of the Charles began to fill with menacing black clouds. The crowds, however, were too immersed in their musical evening to observe the approaching signals.

Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, the former Miss Ellen Bottomley, said after the storm was over: "This is the first time in 15 years that my husband has had rain on an opening night." She seemed to think it might be a good omen.

Mr. Fiedler said: "Well, at least, we got started. The concerts will continue tonight at 7:30, according to schedule."

CUMBERLAND, MD.
TIMES

JUL 3 1943

By TOM CHASE

Boston, July 19 (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when war-time restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurances and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Postlude of Thunder and Rain Mars Esplanade Series Opener

By RUDOLPH ELIE

As the 15th anniversary of practically anything is a fairly impressive ceremony, old Donder and Blitzen himself made a sudden appearance at the opening concert of the Esplanade last night to send Gov. Saltonstall, Commissioner Hultman and about 14,000 people scrambling for cover.

The thunderstorm started to rumble its throaty warning about a half-hour after the concert began, but only a handful lent it their ears as they were busily lending them to "March Slave," which the augmented Esplanade orchestra of 81 Boston Symphony musicians under Arthur Fiedler were thundering out of the $300,000 Hatch Memorial Shell.

THEN CAME THE RAIN

When the downpour came, 13,999 were still there, and in a striking demonstration of patriotic intensity, thousands of them remained to stand at perfect attention during the performance, in the torrent, of "The Star Spangled Banner." The rest galloped in the general direction of Charles street, looking for unoccupied doorways.

Until the rain came, the concert series had begun in much its usual fashion. The beginning hour set ahead to 7:30 out of respect to the dimout regulations, the throngs were slow in coming, and by concert time an estimated crowd of 10,000 was gathered. By 8 o'clock, however, the grassy "platter," as the men of the orchestra call the central seating area, was full, as were sections on either side.

As might have been expected, there were thousands of men and women in uniform for the opening of the famed outdoor concerts. They were lounging on the grass, standing about in earnest clusters, and obviously amazed at the brilliant acoustics of the shell. Civilians, ranging in age from 4 to 84, belied the war-time grimness with the color and gayety of their clothing, with whites and reds predominating.

Amongst them circulated neatly uniformed girls of the Beta Sigma Phi sorority selling War Bonds and Stamps, while posted at regular intervals were the green go-carts into which the public poured thousands of nickels and dimes, for these concerts are dependent on contribution from the general public. When the rain came splashing down, the girls in charge of the go-carts gritted their teeth and took their dousing to protect their money-laden wagons.

At the interval, Gov. Saltonstall, who had been lounging on the grass listening to the concert like the rest of us, appeared on the platform. As he was announced, through the public address system, the entire audience rose to its feet, and cheered him upon his introduction by Com. Eugene Hultman.

He spoke briefly, lauding Mr. Fiedler and the men of the orchestra on the accomplishments of the 15 years of the series, which was founded in 1929 by Arthur Fiedler with only 48 men and in a flimsy $2500 wooden shell.

"There's no better way to spend an evening," the Governor said, "than coming here with our girl friends or our families, and listening to this beautiful music. It is for just such things as this that we fight."

The storm, which deceived many into thinking it was going to stick to the Cambridge side of the river, actually began during the intermission. There were a few tentative drops, but not enough to convince any one they had plenty of comrades in support, and the orchestra hastened back to its place to carry on. The first bar of the national anthem seemed to unleash the rain, but for the few minutes of its playing the crowd held its position.

PARKED CARS SCARCE

The crowd of 14,000 people, although not as large as those coming to the opening concerts of other seasons, was considered phenomenal under the present transportational difficulties. Few parked cars were observed this year, where usually there have been thousands. The crowd was exceedingly orderly.

Tomorrow night the concerts introduce the first of its series of speakers when John Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony orchestra, discusses Beethoven. These talks are sponsored by the state Division of University Extension.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

JUL 18 1943

EXPERIMENTAL SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is experimenting this summer with a series of seven concerts suitable for orchestra of chamber proportions, although not all of it is written as "chamber music."

Under seven different conductors, all the principal players of the Boston Symphony will take part, with such others as are needed. The music selected ranges from Bach and Scarlatti to modern and even contemporary composers. One program, for instance, will be made up of works by Haydn, Handel, Wagner and Shostakovich.

Jul 19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summ concerts by the principals and other pla ers of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Sander theater, Cambridge. The soloists wer Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Rich ard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the fo lowing all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251).
Three Arias with Orchestra.
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486) Bester Jungling."
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Welt talis," (K. 429): "Die danken wir di Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig sum Herrn erho ben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisa of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let us hope, of nevers!"

...most, and presented the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

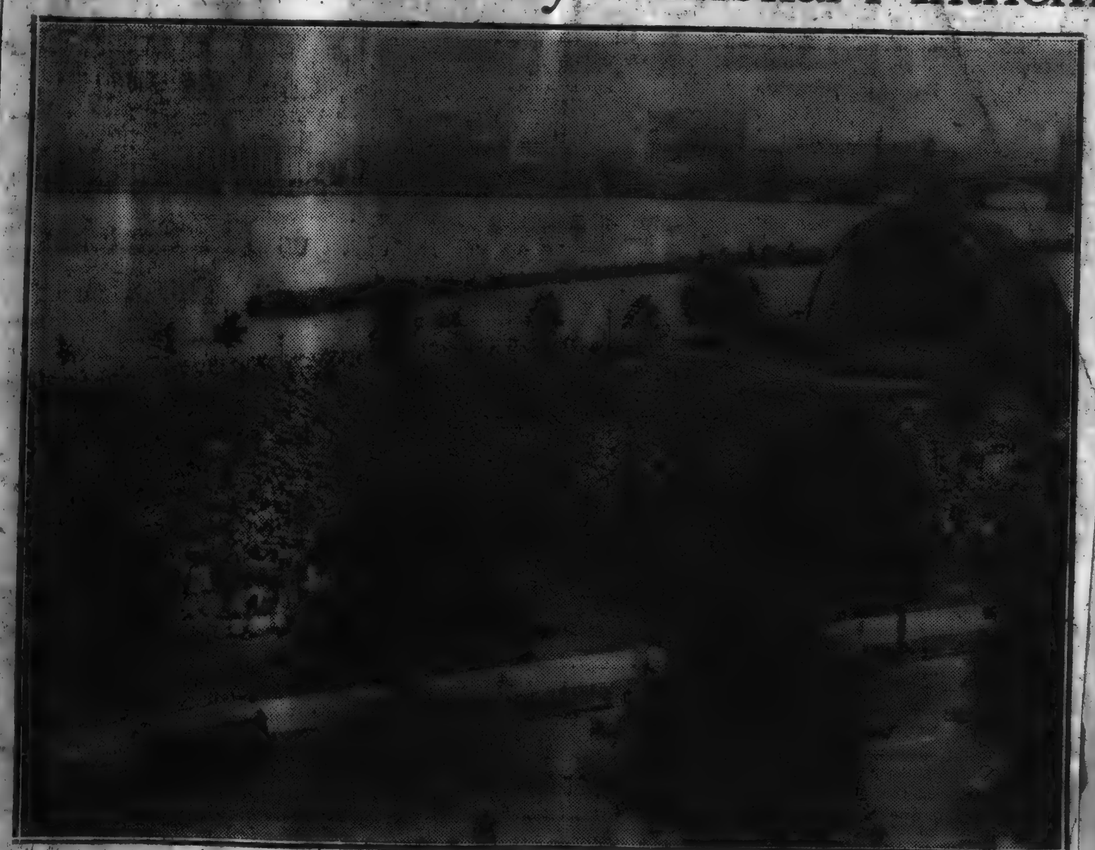
It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

PENING NIGHT AT THE ESPLANADE last night as the Esplanade concerts began thei 5th season. Threatening weather was blamed for the attendance being lower than o pening nights of other years. The concerts will be from 7:30 to 9 this year, every nigh except Monday.

Stampede of 14,000 at Esplanade Concert Halted by National Anthem



ANTHEM HALTS STAMPEDE OF ESPLANADE 14,000

When rain fell at last night's opening of summer night concerts on the Charles River Esplanade, the crowd o 14,000 persons started to stampede. But the orchestra struck up the "Star Spangled Banner" and the grea throng halted and sang the anthem through to the end.

BOX OFFICE
KANSAS CITY, MO.
JUN 19 1943

Koussevitzky Sponsors Plan For American Composers

BOSTON—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has a plan to make American composers imperishable and to support those who need such support while they are struggling for recognition. It will interest everyone in the theatrical world, for Koussevitzky is of sufficient importance to have his opinions deeply interest all.

Koussevitzky terms his plan "Justice to Composers" and he is going into it heart and soul to actually interest musicians, music lovers and theatre men the world over.

He believes that American composers, in particular, lack recognition. He proposes that a fund be created to promote and encourage composers throughout the world and to see that their works are given a thorough and impartial hearing on every side by experts and in turn tried out by orchestras.

Koussevitzky hopes to be able to interest the high officials of the amusement and music world.

Continued From First Page

As the first of the rain descended through the zig-zagging of the lightning, Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, struck up with the stirring notes of the "Star Spangled Banner." Almost without a single exception, men, women and children came to a halt. They remained standing in the driving storm, their voices raised in the familiar words of freedom. By the time the last note was sounded, they had recovered from their panicky reaction, even though the squall was at its height.

Girls in pretty summer clothes, ribbons, flowers, gay-printed dresses and colored open-toed shoes that had cost many a coupon tried to protect their precious finery with newspapers and their escorts' coats.

Governor Saltonstall was among those caught in the rain. After making his speech, in which he referred to "this beautiful evening in which a free people can listen to the music and watch the sailboats in the river," the skies on the farther side of the Charles began to fill with menacing black clouds. The crowds, however, were too immersed in their musical evening to observe the approaching signals.

Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, the former Miss Ellen Bottomley, said after the storm was over: "This is the first time in 15 years that my husband has had rain on an opening night." She seemed to think it might be a good omen.

Mr. Fiedler said: "Well, at least, we got started. The concerts will continue tonight at 7:30, according to schedule."

CUMBERLAND, MD.
TIMES
JUL 19 1943

By TOM CHASE

Boston, July 19 (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never have time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

Postlude of Thunder and Rain Mars Esplanade Series Opener

By RUDOLPH ELIE

As the 15th anniversary of practically anything is a fairly impressive ceremony, old Donder and Blitzen himself made a sudden appearance at the opening concert of the Esplanade last night to send Gov. Saltonstall, Commissioner Hultman and about 14,000 people scrambling for cover.

The thunderstorm started to rumble its throaty warning about a half-hour after the concert began, but only a handful lent it their ears as they were busily lending them to "March Slave," which the augmented Esplanade orchestra of 81 Boston Symphony musicians under Arthur Fiedler were thundering out of the $300,000 Hatch Memorial Shell.

THEN CAME THE RAIN

When the downpour came, 13,999 were still there, and in a striking demonstration of patriotic intensity, thousands of them remained to stand at perfect attention during the performance, in the torrent, of "The Star Spangled Banner." The rest galloped in the general direction of Charles street, looking for unoccupied doorways.

Until the rain came, the concert series had begun in much its usual fashion. The beginning hour set ahead to 7:30 out of respect to the dimout regulations, the throngs were slow in coming, and by concert time an estimated crowd of 10,000 was gathered. By 8 o'clock, however, the grassy "platter," as the men of the orchestra call the central seating area, was full, as were sections on either side.

As might have been expected, there were thousands of men and women in uniform for the opening of the famed outdoor concerts. They were lounging on the grass, standing about in earnest clusters, and obviously amazed at the brilliant acoustics of the shell. Civilians, ranging in age from 4 to 84, belied the wartime grimness with the color and gayety of their clothing, with whites and reds predominating.

Amongst them circulated neatly uniformed girls of the Beta Sigma Phi sorority selling War Bonds and Stamps, while posted at regular intervals were the green go-carts into which the public poured thousands of nickels and dimes, for these concerts are dependent on contributions from the general public. When the rain came splashing down, the girls in charge of the go-carts gritted their teeth and took their dousing to protect their money-laden wagons.

At the interval, Gov. Saltonstall, who had been lounging on the grass listening to the concert like the rest of us, appeared on the platform. As he was announced, through the public address system, the entire audience rose to its feet, and cheered him upon his introduction by Com. Eugene Hultman.

He spoke briefly, lauding Mr. Fiedler and the men of the orchestra on the accomplishments of the 15 years of the series, which was founded in 1929 by Arthur Fiedler with only 48 men and in a flimsy $2500 wooden shell.

"There's no better way to spend an evening," the Governor said, "than coming here with our girl friends or our families, and listening to this beautiful music. It is for just such things as this that we fight."

The storm, which deceived many into thinking it was going to stick to the Cambridge side of the river, actually began during the intermission. There were a few tentative drops, but not enough to convince any one they had plenty of comrades in support, and the orchestra hastened back to its place to carry on. The first bar of the national anthem seemed to unleash the rain, but for the few minutes of its playing the crowd held its position.

PARKED CARS SCARCE

The crowd of 14,000 people, although not as large as those coming to the opening concerts of other seasons, was considered phenomenal under the present transportational difficulties. Few parked cars were observed this year, where usually there have been thousands. The crowd was exceedingly orderly.

Tomorrow night the concerts introduce the first of its series of speakers when John Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony orchestra, discusses Beethoven. These talks are sponsored by the state Division of University Extension.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurances and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
JUL 18 1943

EXPERIMENTAL SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is experimenting this summer with a series of seven concerts suitable for orchestra of chamber proportions, although not all of it is written as "chamber music."

Under seven different conductors, all the principal players of the Boston Symphony will take part, with such others as are needed. The music selected ranges from Bach and Scarlatti to modern and even contemporary composers. One program, for instance, will be made up of works by Haydn, Handel, Wagner and Shostakovich.

KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
JUL 19 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 19 1943

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS
JUL 19 1943

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JUL 19

OWOSSO, MICH.
ARGUS PRESS
JUL 19

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 19

This Clipping From
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS

This Clipping From
BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

All Soloists In Symphony's Unique Series

Mozart's Works Make up First Concert of Boston Orchestra

Boston, July 19 (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire Festival—in which every man appeared or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire Festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 20 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

ome True
y Players
ns Start Unique
ac Problem on Is ioning

he first concert was devoted en-ly to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians
Problems

ny Orchestra
sts' Program
is Inaugurate
ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and in-ded some of the best of his er-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra.
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
19

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

(Continued from page one)

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
JUL 19 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 19 1943

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS
JUL 19 1943

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JUL 19 1943

OWOSSO, MICH.
ARGUS PRESS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 20 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

ome True
y Players
ns Start Unique as Problem
on Is ioning

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians
Problem

ony Orchestra
sts' Program
is Inaugurate
ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his er-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
JUL 19 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 19 1943

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS
JUL 19 1943

light tanks weigh up to 17½ tons, medium tanks go to 30 tons, and the heaviest hitters scale in at more than 60 tons. All are radio-equipped.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

July 19

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

ome True
y Players
ns Start Unique
as Problem
on Is ioning

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians

ny Orchestra
sts' Program
is Inaugurate
ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his er-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Concert Series

Boston — (AP) — Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were desired to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together durinf busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number. The program included the G-major piano concerto, the "Haffner" Serenade and three arias sung by Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky.

[illegible] passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky, being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

This Clipping From Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

[illegible] apartment: 6-room [illegible] Dial 3-3066 [illegible] 13 rooms, 2 baths, $75 [illegible] and houses. MILLER, 4-3360 [illegible] 4 rooms and bath. [illegible] 12-room house, 2 baths [illegible] location. Very fine home [illegible] $75.00; will sell; $700 [illegible] 13 Pennsylvania Ave., 4-3066 [illegible] Small house, 9 miles from [illegible] bus line; past door [illegible] furnished; suitable for cou[illegible] $10 per month; references [illegible] Bungalow, Great Bend [illegible] $25 month. 12 buses to Bing[illegible] Phone 4-3104 7 [illegible]

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

KINGSTON, N.Y.
FREEMAN
JUL 19 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1943

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 20 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

...ome True

...y Players

...ns Start Unique

...as Problem

...on Is

...ioning

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians

...ny Orchestra

...sts' Program

...is Inaugurate

...ome Concerts

...ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his ...er-known compositions. Boris ...dovsky, noted for his Mozart ...erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra.
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Concert Series

BOSTON, July 19 —(AP) —Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire Festival — in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about —obviously were designed to present music old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire Festivals, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Subscribe in Droves

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out - of - the - ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

Played Beyond Compare

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-Major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about —obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

(Continued from page one)

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

ome True
y Players
ns Start Unique
as Problem
on Is ioning

he first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians
Problem

ony Orchestra
sts' Program
is Inaugurate
ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his er-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts come to an end.

Series Today

BOSTON —(AP)— Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the canceling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about — obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-Major Piano Concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts come to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" Serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky, being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about —obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

(Continued from page one)

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel

19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

ome True
y Players
ns Start Unique
as Problem
ion Is ioning

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians

ony Orchestra
sts' Program s Inaugurate
ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his er-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts comes to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts comes to an end.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

Amusingly Discusses
The Question Of Soft Touches

Damon Runyon

In a round table discussion the other evening, the question of soft touches came up, the delegates present being, gentlemen who seemed to speak with the authority of keen observation, if not experience. Let me express it this way, a plain that a soft touch is a person from whom money is easily borrowed. It was agreed at the meeting that the softest touch in the United States is a certain movie magnate of Hollywood. (I will mention no names in this thesis, lest I expose the touches to avalanches of touches.)

Then the debate ran the gamut as the saying is, of the various types of touches, and first place in this philanthropy was unanimously assigned the type that might be described as the volunteer touch which is to say the fellow who takes a man aside without any solicitation and inquires: "Do anything?"

For Boston

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP.)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire Festival — in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" Serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit, and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn, Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully, and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully, and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully, and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

(Continued from page one)

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

[91]

son from whom money is easily borrowed. It was agreed at the meeting that the soloist

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

ome True

y Players

ns Start Unique

as Problem

on Is ioning

Musicians

ony Orchestra

sts' Program

is Inaugurate

ome Concerts

ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his ler-known compositions. Boris dovsky, noted for his Mozart erpretations, conducted for the

MUSIC

July 19

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)

Three Arias with Orchestra

From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"

From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"

From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"

"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart

Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the canceling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

Subscribe in Droves.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out of the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

Others to Play Solos.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit, and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn, Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully, and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of fourteen concerts come to an end.

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

(Continued from page one)

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 20 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

...ome True
...y Players
...ns Start Unique
...as Problem
...on Is
...ioning

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians

...ny Orchestra
...sts' Program
...s Inaugurate
...ome Concerts

...ly to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his ...er-known compositions. Boris ...dovsky, noted for his Mozart ...erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts comes to an end.

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to Summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for extended solo work before the series of 14 concerts comes to an end.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel
JUL 19

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 20 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

Boston Symphony will
This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER

JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL

JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN

JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
Grafton W Va.
Sentinel

JUL 19

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

JUL 19

...ome True

...y Players ... Start Unique ... as Problem ...on Is ...ioning

Musicians ... Problem

...ony Orchestra ...sts' Program ...s Inaugurate ...ome Concerts

...ly to Mozart's works, and in...ded some of the best of his ...er-known compositions. Boris ...dovsky, noted for his Mozart ...erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for solo work before the series of 14 concerts ends.

MUSIC

July 19

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

Hub Concerts Feature Solos By Each Man

BOSTON, July 19.—(AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resort or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy Winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities for solo work before the series of 14 concerts ends.

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Top-flight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result musicwise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

being "Bester Juengling"), she was very good to hear.

Richard Burgin, playing the solo part in the "Haffner" Serenade, has seldom played with such finesse and such technical assurance, and that on a day when violin strings are about as dependable as gas rations. It was astonishing. The program is to be repeated tonight in the air-conditioned New England Mutual Hall, and it is definitely something to hear.

[91]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
JUL 20 1943

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JUL 1943

This Clipping
PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
JUL 19 1943

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JUL 19 1943

BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

BRIDGETON, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 20 1943

BENTON HARBOR, MICH.
NEWS-PALLADIUM
JUL 19 1943

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 19 1943

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL
JUL 19 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
JUL 19 1943

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
JUL 19 1943

This Clipping From
Clinton W Va.
JUL 19

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 19

Boston, July 19 (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire Festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire Festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser-known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky sang three arias tastefully and all of the men performed admirably in the many solo passages.

Other musicians will have further opportunities to [illegible] extended solo works, arias and all varies of fourteen [illegible] formed admirably in the end.

[illegible] o passages.
[illegible] musicians will [illegible] opportunities
[illegible] th[illegible]

Boston S[illegible] will Give U[illegible] n

(By
BOSTON [illegible]ght members of [illegible]ny orchestra b[illegible] series of concerts toda[illegible] nks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs—the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wa[illegible] time restrictions prevented firs[illegible] desk men from making customa[illegible] excursions to the Berkshire fes[illegible]

Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The twenty musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Mr. Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Mr. Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

[illegible] ed
[illegible] ons,
[illegible] op-
[illegible] usic-
[illegible] the [illegible] oted
[illegible] and [illegible] his [illegible] oris
[illegible] zart
[illegible] the [illegible] with ome True

y Players
ns Start Unique
as Problem
on Is ioning

[illegible]he first concert was devoted en[illegible]ly to Mozart's works, and includ-

Musicians
[illegible]

ony Orchestra
sts' Program
is Inaugurate
ome Concerts

[illegible]ly to Mozart's works, and in[illegible]ded some of the best of his [illegible]er-known compositions. Boris [illegible]dovsky, noted for his Mozart [illegible]erpretations, conducted for the

Every Musician Is Soloist In Unique Concert Series

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Mass., July 19.—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today, thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival, in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs, the kind real musicians dream about, obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during busy winter months in the desired out-of-the-ordinary combinations, took advantage of the present opportunity, and as a result music-wise Bostonians subscribed to the series in droves.

The first concert was devoted entirely to Mozart's works, and included some of the best of his lesser known compositions. Boris Goldovsky, noted for his Mozart interpretations, conducted for the most part, changing roles with Richard Burgin, the orchestra's famous concert master, in one number.

The 20 musicians played beautifully and sometimes beyond compare. In the delightful G-major piano concerto, Goldovsky brought out all of Mozart's inherent wit and Burgin (then conducting) kept the orchestra in perfect proportion, permitting those marvelous woodwind passages full scope.

In turn Burgin played the violin solo in the "Haffner" serenade (Goldovsky conducting) with astonishing assurance and skill. Mrs. Margaret Codd Goldovsky

MUSIC

July 19

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Summer Symphony

The first concert in a series of summer concerts by the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given yesterday afternoon in Sanders theater, Cambridge. The soloists were Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Boris Goldovsky, pianist. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the following all-Mozart program:

Divertimento in D major (K. 251)
Three Arias with Orchestra
From "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486): "Bester Jungling"
From the Cantata, "Dir, Seele de Weltalls," (K. 429): "Dir danken wir die Freude"
From the Cantata, "Davidde Penitente," (K. 469): "Freudig zum Herrn erhoben"
"Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250) Mozart
Piano Concerto in G major (K. 453) Mozart

The most apt one-word appraisal of the "seersucker symphonies," launched yesterday afternoon in Sanders Theater by about 22 principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is most certainly "bravo!"

The series looked exceedingly appetizing on paper (and how could it look otherwise with such an ensemble performing it?), but it proved even more tasty in the fulfilment. It was hot, of course; hot as Tophet, but if summer theater audiences are willing to endure a few extra degrees of Fahrenheit, should it be said music lovers are not as hardy? A chorus, let ue hope, of nevers!"

As the program was devoted wholly to Mozart, and just about the best of Mozart's lesser-known work at that, the orchestra was perfectly proportioned, there being 13 strings, and a pair each of oboes, flutes, bassoons and horns. As the performers were mainly the first-desk musicians of the Boston Symphony, the quality of performance was exceedingly good and sometimes beyond compare. Moreover, as Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is noted for his Mozart scholarship, the tempos, the nuances, the contrasts and the sudden bursts of humor were entirely right.

It is true he might have overstressed the quality of humor a bit, for Mozart's wit seldom needs quite so much emphasis, but better that way, surely, than to have it buried completely. In the enchanting G major Piano Concerto (conducted by Richard Burgin), he was superb, and for once we were all able to hear the extraordinary beautiful woodwind texture of the score.

Margaret Codd Goldovsky, making her first public appearance here, proved to be an accomplished, well-schooled singer. Her voice was light but exceptionally true, and she took the coloratura passages with flexibility and grace. She had, moreover, more than fleeting touches of the true Mozart style. While there were occasional moments of forcing, and her diction was not always wholly clear (a distinct exemption

Music Called Stimulant For Our Armed Forces

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music is a dominant need of our time. "It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for the future. Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort, to inspire. Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man," says this eminent musician.

Boston Musicians Solve No Gas, No Berkshire Festival Problems

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, July 19, (AP)—Topflight members of the Boston Symphony orchestra began a unique series of concerts today—thanks to the ban on pleasure driving and the cancelling of the Berkshire festival—in which every man appeared, or will appear, as a soloist.

The unusual programs — the kind real musicians dream about—obviously were designed to present music, old and new, that ordinarily failed to fit into the standardized patterns of symphonic and chamber work.

The idea developed when wartime restrictions prevented first-desk men from making customary excursions to the Berkshire festival, to summer resorts or to former homes abroad.

Virtuoso musicians, who never had time to play together during

(Continued from page one)

